State Treasurer, Redden Reports On Gasoline Shortage Effects

State Treasurer Jim Redden, at a hearing on the fuel shortage held recently by the House Committee on Transportation, told the Committee "The serious consequences of a gasoline shortage in the country or in this state cannot be exaggerated."

"Charges have been leveled at the oil industry by independent and major gasoline dealers and many consumer groups that the oil shortage is artificially created in order to relax environmental restrictions and to increase the depletion allowance and other tax incentives for industry," he said.

Redden said he and Committee Chairman Howard Willits felt the hearing was necessary "to attempt to find the facts and possible solutions" in the predicted gasoline shortage. "If the shortage is as drastic as some predict," Redden warned the Committee, "the Legislature may be forced to take steps to lessen the financial blow to local communities and to the state."

Redden said he hoped the testimony presented at the hearing from both sides of the argument would enable the Committee to determine the seriousness of the problem and to take whatever steps might be necessary to protect citizens of Oregon and its economy.

Redden listed three areas of major concern which the Committee should consider:

1. The Oregon economy, which receives a total of 87.6 million dollars per year from the gasoline tax, of which 8.6 million is contributed by tourists. Cities receive 12 per cent and counties 20 per cent of these funds and drastically reduced gas sales could result in "budgetary disaster" for local governments.

Redden pointed out that half of the 460 million dollars Oregon gets from tourists comes during the summer months and a gasoline shortage at this time would certainly cripple the tourist industry.

2. The consumer, who is faced with skyrocketing gasoline costs. Redden said the recent announcement from Washington that rationing will not be necessary because higher prices will reduce sales of gasoline means no help for the consumer on the national level.

3. The independent gasoline dealers, who are concerned that they will be forced out of business. Redden said this would be a further blow to the Oregon consumer as independent dealers provide a lid on consumer prices.
