I have no desire in any manner shape or form to be the proud owner of a miniature automobile. I find it difficult to fold my long legs into the leg room. In most instances I feel that I'm putting the car on rather than getting into it. In one instance I'm certain that I would have been wiped out had I been sitting in the driver's seat of a small auto. Regardless of my present feelings I know that my next car will probably be one of the small types. While traveling by bus through Europe I saw thousands of autos. Not one in five hundred was as large as a Ford or Chevy. Rome has a population of 3 million and a car registry of about 2 million. Little cars go around in swarms like bats out of hell. Once in a while a large car will be seen because government officials all over the world MUST drive large cars. It was interesting to note that most of the cars were made in Europe. This makes sense since it helps everyone in Europe to make a better living. The Fiat is made in Torino, Italy. They have plants all over the place, everything from a steel mill to paint shops. I was told that over 100,000 people work in these plants and I think I saw about 500,000 Fiats jammed on the streets.

It took our bus about 20 minutes to go 3 blocks. We were completely surrounded by Fiats. If you happen to live in Torino a Fiat is a car of choice. Not a Datsun or a Toyota but a Fiat.

I couldn't help but wonder when the United States is going to wake up to the fact that our automobile industry is in danger. Some day we may be forced to drive small cars, or perhaps I should say low cost cars, or small low cost cars. We can make a small car as good as any foreign make but can we compete in the low cost field? We can if one of two things happen, either our cost of production goes down or their cost goes up. Then of course we must learn to buy our own products because mass production will also cause a lowering of price. As things now stand the United States is taking a terrible beating on the balance of trade in the automotive industry. We had better start making small cars and/or start buying at home.
