OREGON DAIRY PRINCESS Janice Waibel joined with Robert Hoerner, vice president-marketing of Cabana Coach Corp., to draw winner for 1973 "Milk Has Something For Every Body" contest sponsored jointly by Cabana and Dairy Farmers of Oregon. Winner is Raymond T. Villerup of Eugene. He receives use of 1973 Cabana motor home for two months plus 500 gallons of gasoline. Promotion was "one of the most exciting projects undertaken by Oregon dairymen," according to Ray Kozak, executive secretary of the Oregon Dairy Products Commission. Villerup's name was selected from among 20 finalists. "More than 50,000 Oregonians participated in the six-week event which included local contests in communities across the state," Kozak said.

Your County Agent Says:

CORN SILAGE HARVEST

Time is important. This area's large corn silage crop is coming along in great shape and will soon start moving into the pits. With livestock feed at an all time high price, it is important that the corn be cut at a stage when the food value of the crop is at its highest.

Studies by the University of Idaho Experiment Stations and other sources show the best time to harvest corn for silage is when the crop reaches about the 65% moisture stage. A rough guide as to when corn has reached this stage is to test the texture of the corn by breaking the immature grain with the thumb nail. Corn in the right stage for harvest will be at the full dent stage and will show a grainy texture when gouged with the thumb nail. Total moisture of the plant at this stage will be between 65 and 70%. Grain contribution to total dry matter will be between 40 and 50%.

The University of Idaho compared yields of silage corn at the 72% and 63% moisture levels. They found that the immature corn harvested at the 72% moisture level yielded 3 1/2 tons more green fodder but--and here is the important point--the lower moisture corn, corn harvested at the more mature moisture level produced half a ton more dry matter per acre. The extra weight in the immature corn was moisture which contributed nothing to the value of the corn silage.

ARMY WORMS MAY BE OUR

Next Insect Problem. It seems that we have had one of our worst insect pest years in spite of the exceedingly cold weather experienced last winter. Loopers, aphids, spider mites, alfalfa weevil and other pests have run rough shod over a number of our crops this season. If the pattern continues we could experience another bad army worm fall.

Farmers should be on the lookout for these pests and control them before they do major damage. The small worms are much easier to control with insecticides than the ones that are getting along towards maturity.

IRRIGATION OF POTATOES

and Onions. This time of year is very critical as far as irrigation on potatoes and onions is concerned. Your labors of the entire past season can be lost if you misjudge these last few irrigations.

Water demands by these crops slow up during this time of year due to cool nights and maturing plants. This means that it is very easy to over-irrigate and cause water-rot in your potatoes or excessive moisture in onions, which in both cases causes storage problems.

In order to avoid the problem, check your fields from one end to the other and try to determine just what your soil moisture situation is. If your field is close to field capacity you probably have enough moisture to mature your onions and even your potatoes if they are 50 - 60% dead.

If your potato field is still green, like some of the others around the area, you may want to irrigate them two and maybe three more times. It all depends on the condition of your individual field.

CATTLE DISEASE

Cattle coming off of extremely dry range onto lush green feed are particularly vulnerable to pulmonary emphysema, or as some folks call it, big brisket disease. Primary cause of this disease is a rapid change in protein. To hold down the probability of this death-dealing disease, cattle should be worked onto green lush feed gradually either by moving them off the feed after a short time each day or by feeding some hay or other source of dry feed for a few hours a day until
