U.S. National Bank Launches Savings Game

One of banking's oldest messages - "save money" has been approached from a fresh angle by U. S. National Bank of Oregon. Everyone knows they should save money. But, particularly in these times, it can be a hard task.

In a major advertising campaign just launched, U. S. Bank is encouraging Oregonians to develop their savings habit by playing the "Savings Game."

The idea of the Savings Game is strategy. As any good money manager will admit, there are many ways to increase savings earnings by carefully moving dollars from basic passbook accounts to more sophisticated certificates, monthly income plans and even annuity programs. The elements are similar throughout the industry, but the game concept is a new approach.

U.S. Bank has treated this serious subject in a light way, utilizing a new, copyrighted game to illustrate the importance of saving and planning for maximum rate.

The "Savings Game" is being made available at no cost, while supplies last, at all 135 U. S. Bank branches.

"By the time a person moves around the game board one time, it is easy to see how important a planned savings program really is," according to R. C. Pesci, senior vice-president and marketing manager for U. S. Bank. "For the first time, someone is taking a moment to show people the strategies. It's really not all that complicated."

The role of savings counselor has gone public with U. S. Bank's new Savings Game promotion. While the obvious goal is to gain new deposit dollars, these bankers are convinced some new, important savings habits may result from the program as well.

Portland sales and marketing executives assisting at the installation will be Murray McBride, marketing consultant and principal of Murray McBride Associates; John Donnelly, general manager of Stan Wiley, Inc., Realtors; Kenneth J. Hunt, marketing manager, Portland division, Portland General Electric Co.; Lyle W. Salquist retired marketing consultant and executive secretary of Portland Sales and Marketing Executives; and Zack Brandon, sales executive with Pacific Yard Service.

Speaking at the initiation banquet will be another Portlander, Bob Wirtz, a division sales promotion manager for Jantzen, Inc.

Among the 21 OSU students who will be charter members of the new chapter is Gary Sadamori, senior, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Sadamori of Nyssa.
