

Army Apprenticeship Planned For Near Future

The first Army-wide apprenticeship program will begin at many Army posts in a matter of months. Acting Army Secretary Norman R. Augustine predicts the Army's decision to accept national apprenticeship standards may benefit "many tens of thousands of soldiers" each year. The agreement signed by Labor Secretary John T. Dunlop and Augustine makes it the first such program in any of the Armed Forces according to Defense and Labor Department officials.

Coming at a time when such training is in heavy demand and Vo-Techs are turning students away due to lack of space, initial programs will affect jobs involved with operation and repair of heavy equipment vehicles, followed by health care, food service, and automotive maintenance. There are about 460 possible programs.

News About SERVICEMEN

Manuel Perez

Manuel Perez, son of Mr. and Mrs. Juan F. Perez of Nyssa, has completed a summer phase of instruction as a student of the U. S. Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland.

He was embarked on a six-week training cruise aboard the destroyer USS Agerholm, homeported in San Diego.

Perez participated in a fleet exercise and visited several West Coast cities including Everett, Wash. He is a 1974 graduate of Nyssa High School.

Until now it has been difficult to show civilian employers a record of training and experience from the service. Augustine states the agreement will give a "real payoff" to the participants, the nation and the Army. The Army won't teach the entire program but soldiers "will get credit for what they do on the job." They will also be able to take extra apprenticeship training during off-duty hours if they wish.
