Fish can be caught in the Sahara Desert. By digging through the sand to underground streams fishermen can obtain fresh-water fish.

It'll be a really cold day before you'll need this.

Near Chehalis, Washington, natural gas is stored underground for cold day use. Some years ago an attempt to drill for oil brought about the discovery of an underground formation that could be used to store natural gas. This storage area can deliver more energy than twice the total energy capacity of Grand Coulee Dam.

On days of mild weather, natural gas is wisely pumped underground into storage from the Pacific Northwest supply pipeline. When the temperature drops, this reserve natural gas can be pumped back into the supply system to offset the sudden demands placed on regular supply sources.

Although the storage project is jointly owned and operated by our supplying pipeline and other Northwest utilities, Cascade Natural Gas can draw on the stored gas to serve our Washington and Oregon customers.

Cold day planning by Cascade and the gas industry will improve supply, but you the customer must do your part too. Natural gas is a vital energy, do what you can to conserve it. Remember: we have energy to burn, but none to waste.
