Nearly 300 range horses left Eastern Oregon, Sunday, bound for Portland. Their days of roaming sagebrush land are over. Never again will they rule the silent prairie, wild and free. On Tuesday they were lead into a hopper—to become fertilizer.

It is said that on the ranges of Eastern Oregon, Southern Idaho and Wyoming there are enough unwanted horses to keep the plant in operation for five to six years. The animals are a nuisance to stockmen, who prefer to have them taken care of in this manner rather than to shoot them.

The Portland company says that every process is to be humane but nevertheless to many a cowboy and buckaroo, it doesn't seem quite right. There is a sympathetic spot in the heart of the man who too has lived in the open for the illfated cayuses that have been his company. Yet when all angles are considered, the action seems the best course to take. The useless range nags will be come useful and the ranges upon which they feed will be used for cattle and sheep.
