The Metric System

By Adriana Kunkel

In the two exercises you've done with the metric system, you've probably discovered that it is a lot like our money system where 10 cents equals a dime, 100 cents equals a dollar, and 10 dimes equals a dollar. The metric system is an easy system to convert from one unit to another.

Now that you've learned that a centimeter is one-hundredth of a meter, then you can expect to find 100 centimeters in a meter. Just like you'd expect 4 one-fourth pieces of a pie in one pie and 100 centigrams in one gram. Since millimeter is one-thousandth of a meter, how many millimeters are there in a meter? (Right, 1000.)

There is one prefix in the metric system which also expresses a fraction of a unit (but it is used infrequently) and that is the "deci-". It is like our dime. A dime is one-tenth of a dollar and a decimeter (dm) is one-tenth of a meter. How many dms in a meter? How many cms in a dm?

Let us compare a cm with dm. How many cms in a dm? How many cms in a dm?

Now you know three of the fractional (or decimal) prefixes of the metric system: milli, centi, and deci. Last week you learned there were 10 mms in a cm. Today you learned there were 10 cms in a dm and 10 dms in a meter. (Keep cents and dimes and dollars in your mind as you "tie" down these prefixes. Milli isn't hard to tie down either because taxes in some states are levied as mills per dollar valuation. Ten mills are equivalent to a cent. So that would make 1000 mills equal a dollar. A 1000 mgs equal a gram.)

When we write "cm" for centimeter, "mm" for millimeter, "dm" for decimeter, and "km" for kilometer, we are not abbreviating. It's like saying H2O is water and O is oxygen. The short form for writing units in the metric system will be used more often as more people become acquainted with the system. The short form is pronounced the same as the long form.
