groceries to last all summer when they went to summer range, cooked on campfires, battled cancer and open heart surgery, made a home wherever they were for her frailty, spent many nights in worry over sick infants, sewed by hand, worked on the farm and many more hardships which she came through with flying colors simply because she is a Mother. During the childhood of her children, she always found the time to recite the poems "Somebody's Mother" and "Boy Blue." Mothers are made up of many things, but I am sure that the main thing in Nell Bair's makeup is love and the desire to make others happy. "I'm a little old fashioned perhaps, but my family is my life and I thank God that he has given me a chance to watch my children grow, be there when they need me, look for my swallows to return each spring and raise my American flag to show how much I love my country. Our biggest blessing is our young people and most of them just need to know that someone loves and cares for them, and I really do."

Yes, mothers are extra special and Nell Bair certainly fits the description of what being a mother means to me, and not only is she a mother but a grandmother and a great-grandmother. Their son Cecil and his wife Thelda live on the farm that the older Bairs bought when they moved to Nyssa. They have five daughters and one son and six grandchildren. Their only daughter, Joyce Turner and her husband John Lbert Turner live in Greenleaf, Idaho where she is postmistress. They have three daughters, two sons and three grandchildren. The Bairs youngest son, Carl, who helped run the farm while his father was on an LDS Mission for two years to the West Central States, lives with his wife Jenneke in San Diego. They have blessed the Bairs with three grandsons and one granddaughter.

First, we had our meeting. Then we went into Mrs. Sissons kitchen and made muffins. While they were baking, we went into the living room and started sewing. Some of the kids were pretty near being done with their projects.

We could smell the muffins later on. When Mrs. Hendricks, another leader working with Mrs. Sisson, took the muffins out, everyone ran to get some.

The muffins tasted as good as they smelled. Laura Buchtel, reporter
