Nyssa Library Has Grown Since Horse and Buggy Days

By Alan Abbey

In the horse and buggy days of the late 1800s they called it the "Reading Room." It sat on Main Street near First and was always occupied in the winter because it was kept warm.

After that it sat on Good and First in the North Board of Control Building. Then they moved it to a crowded room in City Hall that is now the judge's chambers.

Finally, nine years ago, the Nyssa Public Library moved its 4,000 volumes into its present home on Main and Fourth.

A long-hoped-for bond issue finally passed and what was once Taylor's Market became the Library. Since 1967 the library has expanded from 4,000 to 13,370 volumes. It lists 14,197 titles. These numbers do not include the magazines, records, maps and paperbacks the library has, nor does it count the unlimited number of books it can get from the Malheur County Library in Ontario.

In its larger quarters library services have expanded. The library engages in a loan program with the Malheur County Jail in Vale, has a paperback swap area where people take one book and leave another, and entertains day care and kindergarten classes.

On its budget of $26,146 a year, the library pays librarian Norma S. Urry and administrative assistant Emi Hirai. They had a lot of part time student help until recently when they cut back on it, partially because of the $3,200 budget cut the library suffered this year. However, the library is continuing many of its programs, including its monthly shows by local artists. Currently Virginia Brandt, a realist painter, is on exhibit. Eight years ago, when the art exhibits began, she was the first artist represented. She continues to help Mrs. Urry and supplies her with lists of local artists. "We're a year and a half ahead," said the librarian.

The library also has a summer reading program with 250 elementary school students involved. This year's theme, naturally enough, is the Bicentennial. But, the library is not without its problems. For the past two years the library has housed the Nyssa High School library and the result is cramped quarters for both. The high school library is now moving out.

Another problem is the occasional controversy aroused over certain books which the library stocks, "especially popular novels," Mrs. Urry said.

This problem is dealt with by asking the complainant to fill out a form which says they've read the entire book. Then the person goes before the Public Library Board, which has also read the book. The Board then decides on what to do.

Mrs. Urry doesn't think the problem will ever disappear. "Books are very personal," she said, and certain people will always take offense to certain books for certain reasons.

What types of books are the most popular in Nyssa? Non-fiction in general is more popular than fiction among library patrons, Mrs. Urry said. With children, history and science books are most popular. "How to" books are checked out a lot. Among adults, "Do it yourself" and crafts books are also very popular.

Just how many people use the Nyssa Public Library? During 1974-75 the library's circulation was 34,560. That is how many books and materials were checked out. "A lot of women, of all ages, read seven books a week," Mrs. Urry said.

Does television watching reduce the amount of reading people do? Mrs. Urry takes the controversial stand that it does not. "People are stimulated by TV to read books," she said, and explained that many people who hear of a book on television, usually on a talk show, come in and ask for it. But what about children? Doesn't television watching cut down on their reading? Mrs. Urry thinks kids are naturally curious and reading is a way to satisfy that curiosity. They are also smarter at a younger age these days and that means more reading. She also contends that parents who don't listen to their kids can turn them off to reading. The education which begins in school must continue at home, she said.

To encourage reading in young children the library has a large children's section. "We try to get books

THE NYSSA SENIOR CITIZENS had a big dinner last week at the Methodist Church on Emison Avenue. After eating a large meal they heard and sang along to oldtime music. They also had a display of antiques.
