

BLM FIRE FIGHTERS are shown monitoring a new device called a Lightning Detector as it traces the progress of a summer lightning storm across the tinder dry rangeland of Southeastern Oregon.

This detector, near Jordan Valley, and one like it at Elko, Nevada have the ability to locate the strikes immediately, and crews can summon fire fighters and equipment to quickly douse the blaze.

This equipment was first used in Alaska, and now that the Alaskan lightning storms are over, will be tested in this area. If the tests prove satisfactory here, the day may not be far away when permanent installations like this will provide lightning detection coverage for the entire West.

Solectric

a solar demonstration home

Can the sun heat a home in an Idaho winter at a cost that makes the effort worthwhile?

Idaho Power intends to find out.

Solectric (solar + electric) is an energy-saving home which will use solar collectors to heat rooms and provide hot water. The solar heat system is backed up by an electric heat pump for use during wintertime cloudiness and for summertime cooling.

The house has energy-saving features that would be a good idea in any home — solar heated or not:

- 2 x 6 studs in walls accommodating extra insulation
- Double-pane windows and storm doors
- Heat losses minimized

The Solectric demonstration home — part of Idaho Power's continuing program to encourage efficient energy use — is located in Boise and is open to public inspection.

The Solectric home. It's one of the ways the people at Idaho Power are working for an energy-wise future.
