UNEXPECTED ANSWER

Who owns American business? That's a question worthy of debate because so many people have misconceptions about it. Most people will answer, "the rich," "the elite," "two per cent of the population" or something similar. But those people are wrong. Their answers may have been true once, but not now.

The correct answer is that a majority of Americans have a piece of the action—and many of them don't even know it. The fact is, private employe pension funds now own more than one-third of business and industry, and it's predicted that they will control 50 per cent by 1985.

Every person who has a life insurance policy—and there are about 365 million of them—also has a stake in business because of his insurance company's corporate holdings.

Then there are Employee Stock Ownership Plans. These plans, which are becoming increasingly popular, encourage employes to buy stock in the company where they work.

Ask yourself again: Who owns American business? If you fit into any of the categories above, the answer is: You do.

Candidates and voters need to remember this in the election. Superficial distinctions between "pro-labor" and "pro-business" positions on issues have little meaning. Most of us who work see a capitalist when we look in the mirror.
