A TALK ABOUT OREGON.

When statements are sent to the people in the east of fortunate localities where nature favors the labors of the husbandman and a propitious climate awakens recollections of the classic "Isles of the Blest," the cautious reader receives them with a grain of salt, allowing for the exuberance of the real estate holder who may be seeking customers for his broad acres. But when praises are sounded by parties who are clearly disinterested; when visitors from other states bear willing and unasked testimony to the bounties that nature has spread with a lavish hand, and point out the advantages that lie open to those who are ready to improve them, a sound judgment is impressed with such a showing, and believes that the amount of wool must be correspondent with the loudness of the cry.

A few days since we published an article from the Alta California, (Col. John P. Irish's paper,) wherein he dwells on the resources of Oregon, and holds forth this state as a geographical complement to California. The writer says:

It is greatly to the interest of California to have a large population in Oregon and Nevada. Oregon must supply us soon with important and necessary commercial productions which we will cease to create for ourselves. The two states will be tributary to each other, generating a mutual prosperity. Oregon has a climate soft and salubrious by contrast with that of the east, and soil that is unrivaled for standard crops. There is plenty of arable land, majestic timber, mineral resources not half developed, and above all the opportunity to buy at moderate figures. These advantages are not lost upon the rest of the country, and beset by a hearty welcome to the new comers, they will speedily ascend what nature has done for the founding of a great American commonwealth.

Frank Pixley also, when he visited this state last fall was vividly impressed with the natural resources which met his eye on all hands, and the fortunes which await the men who shall come in to put them to work. In the following "graceful paragraph" he gives expression to his impressions:

Had I been permitted to occupy the heights of Siskiyou instead of those of Pisgah, his eyes would have been gladdened by overlooking two promised lands, both flowing with milk and honey, both burdened with corn and wine. In its climatic conditions Oregon is unlike California; it is the border land where the four seasons meet the two; where summer, fall, autumn and winter, with their frosts and snows, their falling leaves, their buds and blossoms, their April showers and summer rains, meet the realm where it rains only in winter and is dry in summer; where beautiful meadows in eternal verdure, and forests ever green, fade away to great arid valleys, looking serene, and brown, and desolate in their summer undress. Oregon is more beautiful than California. "Oregon," he says further along, "ought to be, and, we believe, is a first-class dairy state. It is a country of grass from the bed of its streams to the summit of its hills; of rich, nutritious grasses, with strong sod, that never die down under the burning sun; grasses that must be cut, dried, turned to hay, and covered from rain to carry the milking stock through the winter. The grasses of Oregon are like those of New York—timothy, red-top, birds-grasses and clover; and by reason of the frequent rains, crops of great abundance are produced. We can imagine no better country for the production of stall-fed beef, as hay, oats, grains, and catth-feds of all kinds are cheap and abundant."

There is a profitable market in California for the farm and dairy products of this state, and Mr. Pixley makes this useful suggestion:

There is a vast wealth of profit to the Oregon farmer if he will send us his butter and cheese, his chickens and eggs, his apples and cider, and all the lesser productions of his industry, in good and cleanly condition. There ought to be no device of cheesemaking, practical in Switzerland or France, that the Oregon farmer could not improve; there ought to be no trick in butter-making that the Oregon dairyman does not understand. There is a fortune to be made in fat chickens and barn-yard fowls, for, as a rule, our chickens are lean, and unfit to eat. We import cider in bottles from New Jersey, and make it from dried apples with acids. We should get it fresh and pure from Oregon orchards.

"Oregon," this observing writer remarks, "is a great state, and with great resources, and is destined to become the home of a great people."

We reproduce this favorable testimony because the writers are known, and the statements they make can be accepted without reserve. It is clear that a climate that ranges to no extreme of heat or cold, a soil that is capable of producing small grains in abundance and all the fruits that belong to a temperate region; that is never furnished with drought and is unvisited by cyclones, and is yet exempt from the keen competition that makes life so arduous in the more thickly populated states, must be a favorable place for settlement, and cannot fail abundantly to reward the industry of every worker whose skill and diligence entitle him to success.

The decision of Judge Love in the United States Court of the Iowa district is a very important exposition of the law regarding strikes. It affirms the right of railroad employes to quit work, but denies their right to prevent others from working or to interfere with the roads that they have abandoned. It requires railroads to haul freight of all companies on equal terms, and condemns the course of refusing to handle the cars of any road because its employes are on a strike. When one line refuses the traffic of another, it is liable in damages to shippers, and the courts can compel it to carry all goods offered at its depots. In other words, corporations and employes must obey the law of the land in preference to the law of a brotherhood whenever there is a conflict between them.
