A TRAGEDY IN EARLY DAYS.

History of a Skeleton That To-Day Adorns a Salem Hall.

A knot of eager listeners was last night gathered about James Hendershott, a pioneer of Southern Oregon, listening to his narration of a few points of early history and pioneer romance. A CAPITAL JOURNAL man was among the listeners, and this is the story of a Salem tragedy, as told by one of the actors:

In 1837, when Oregon was in three judicial districts, with only three judges and sheriffs, the sheriff of the Southern district, James Hendershott (who now lives in Union and is visiting in Salem temporarily) started for Portland, where the penitentiary was then located. His starting point was Douglas county and the entire journey was to be made on horseback, as railways in those days were not even thought of as winding over the precipitous mountains of Southern Oregon. The sheriff had with him three prisoners who had been sentenced by Judge Deady (now of Portland) to a term of ten years each—the extreme penalty of the law—for highway robbery. The men were John Jackson, known as "Emigrant," "Buckskin Bill," and a man named Hamilton. The first named, had passed his early years in Savannah, Mo., and there received his education. The others were convicted of robbing a man named Combs, on Gray's creek, Josephine county, of $940. They had "held him up" while taking a ride with him in a wagon, claiming to be prospectors from California.

They arrived in Salem, en route to Portland, and the prisoners were placed under guard in the cabinet shop of J. O'Donald (who still resides here). Under some pretext Jackson was permitted to leave the house. He was no sooner out of the door than he made an attempt to escape and was shot, the ball passing through his spine and death followed immediately.

The precise spot where this tragedy occurred was near the site of the present court house, close to the old Bennett house, which burned down a few years ago cremating three Chinamen, in its burning ruins.

The body of Jackson was buried on the bank of the river, and two sets of doctors wanted it. One party hired a man to watch the grave. He went to dinner, and in the interval the other M. D. exhumed it and carried off the remains.

"That ends my story," said Mr. Hendershott, his eyes twinkling, "and if any of you are up to snuff, you will know where the skeleton is to-day. I saw it a short time ago and can assure you it is in good shape. It is mounted and—really is a perfect manakin."

The reporter here ventured to learn from one of the actors in the drama where the skeleton was, but the old ex-sheriff recognized him and would say no more.

THE men who do the lighting and sweeping on St. Peter's dome, were born and have always lived up there and are descendants of persons born up there. It takes all the time of forty-five men to perform the duties. Some of them have never been below.
