

A nice, very useful little book is on the table of the JOURNAL, published by C. W. Barden, Syracuse, N. Y. It contains some fifteen hundred words commonly misused, and by studying what is said about them one will get a clear idea as to hundreds of other words misused in talking and writing.

A Ghost After His Shirt.

A man of Findlay, Ohio, was killed over at Toledo. He left a red shirt in his room and his room mate appropriated it. Yells and screams after midnight aroused the inmates of the hotel who found the poor devil frightened almost to death, swearing the ghost of the shirt owner came after his property.

A Wise Merchant.

The great merchant, Stewart, grew rich by his judicious advertising. But he did not advertise as do our Salem merchants. No, he told people what he had and for how much.

Live and Let Live.

The Examiner compares the saloon to a mad dog, and discusses how to deal with it in a vigorous way. It says: "There are five ways of dealing with the dog, one is to let him run loose and bite whomsoever he pleases; that is free whisky.
