SATURDAY READING!

A Story That Shows a Wonderful Self-Denial Spirit.

ONE WOMAN'S WAY EXPLAINED!

The Laborer is Worthy of His Hire—Vain Sisters Outdone by a Sensible Girl.

It's no use: I've worn all the cast-off clothes I'm going to.

There was no sign of irritation or ill nature in the girl's bright face as she made this assertion.

"What do you propose to wear?" Florence Annabel's only companion on this occasion was her married sister, Mrs. Paul Grenman.

"I don't mean anything unkind, Julia," Miss Annabel replied, "but the truth is, I am not comfortable in second hand clothing."

"Blanche would be edified at your remarks, Florence," said Mrs. Grenman; "it was no easy task to get these things together."

Notwithstanding her protest, the young lady had selected the least injured of the velvet skirts and had begun to rip off the braid.

"That settles it, Julia," she said, with shining eyes, but with no other indication of excitement.

"What stupidity, Florence!" Mrs. Grenman hastened to say. "You know that we want you to have our things."

The lady's tone was a little more conciliatory. She evidently had some reason for not wanting her sister to carry out her threat.

"Perhaps you think that your sisters should keep you supplied with new clothes?" said Mrs. Grenman.

"No, I do not; but I will tell you what I think, Miss Annabel responded, with heightened color, but in firm, cool tones.

"Earn it!" said Mrs. Grenman, disdainfully. "What new and abominable crochet have you got in to your head now? Something to disgrace us all, I suppose."

"If you and Blanche would pay me in hard cash, as you would be compelled to pay a professional, for playing the piano at your luncheon parties and your kettledrums, your receptions and your informal evening gatherings, I could buy my own clothes, and be much better satisfied."

Mrs. Grenman's astonishment and indignation were overwhelming.

"Who ever thought that one of our family could be so coarse and mercenary? Pay one's own sister for playing a few sonatas and quadrilles once in a while! Why don't you ask us to pay you for condescending to attend our kettledrums and receptions? Indeed, Florence, if I must say it, I think you have been generously compensated for anything you have ever done for either of us!"

"Julia, I will find out what a professional pianist will charge for playing the piano the same number of hours that I do," Miss Annabel began again, calmly.

Mrs. Grenman rose, picked off a few bits of the thread from her handsome black silk dress—she had been darned a tiny bit of lace—and proceeded to array herself for the street.

The room in which this conversation took place was the fourth story back of a so-called fashionable boarding house, and this was Florence Annabel's home.

ceedingly peculiar, and could not be induced to make a home with either of her relatives, were in main true. Miss Annabel could have made herself useful in either of these establishments, but her liberty was far too precious to jeopardize by any such arrangement.

A few hours later Miss Annabel was driving in the park with some friends. She passed both of her sisters, and their recognition, though calculated to deceive her companions, was well understood by her.

Clarke Durivage rode along by the side of the landau, and chatted with the young ladies. For the first time since Florence had decided not to wear any more "cast offs" her courage failed her.

Mr. Durivage bade her good evening. "I will not wear jags, and so must play jags."

The young lady did not estimate her musical talent at its true value. It was almost a case of genius. She could play the works of the most favored composer, and with a power and expression which delighted the most critical.

"The die is cast," she told herself, Mr. Durivage bade her good evening. "I will not wear jags, and so must play jags."
