Continued from first page. officers in cavalry uniform approached and Atty was duly introduced and welcomed.

For a few weeks Atty explored the post, saw the guard-mounting, the drills, and regularly visited the stables to see the horses fed, watered and groomed.

Before long he was able to take short trips with Jack, riding Medicine Man, his pony, whose strange taste for tobacco was a daily wonder to the boy.

As they were returning from their last visit Jack pointed to a white line away down in the southwest, just part of the sky and said: "Atty, that is the snow on the summit of the 'Big Horn' Mountains. We are going that way in a week or two on a hunt. Would you like to come along?"

"Atty scoured his pony closer to Stranger and looking curiously at Jack's smiling face. "To go on a hunt, was the ambitious boy, and he wanted to see Jack was serious.

"Yes, Atty, I really will take you along if you desire to go. You are getting stronger every day, and a week's outing in the mountains will not hurt you now."

"Is there any bears in the Big Horn Mountains?" inquired the boy as his eyes brightened. "Ahem," replied Jack, "you forget your rules of Green's grammar now and then, Atty. There are bears there, and deer and antelope and elk and mountain wolves and lions too."

"Can I have a rifle?" Oh Jack I'll be so careful. "Well, we'll see about that," said Jack, diplomatically. "You should be able to handle a .22-caliber, now, we'll see about it."

"Hurrah for the Big Horn!" as a little party of hunters left Fort Custer one bright, sunny morning in October, a few weeks after his trip to Underbattled.

The foliage on the hills was showing tints of orange, gold and brown, intermingled with the sombre green of the pines, the air was loaded with ozone and the merry voices blended with the barking of the hounds and the neighing of the horses.

The "Big Horn" were reached the next day, and the hunters camped in a lovely valley at the foot of the rugged peaks. Next day they would through the passes of the hills and pitched their tent alongside the crystal waters of "Dog Creek," a little stream which bubbled and murmured over its pebbly bed, fresh from the melted snow of the hills.

After the hunters had left camp one morning a young Indian rode in and informed the boy that he had seen a deer down in the abies about a mile up the creek, and Atty started all afire with the "big fever."

He had mastered some hunting craft now, and crept along cautiously, so as not to startle the game. Pretty soon he pushed his head through the shrubs near the stream and there—not a hundred paces off—grazing quietly on the short, dried grass, was a noble buck.

The animal lifted his head and snuffed suspiciously, but as Atty was to the leeward, the scent was not strong. The boy lay down, full length and rested his elbows on the ground as he took aim. "Puff. A flash and a report. When the smoke cleared away he saw the buck bound away, stumble, rise again and then once more jump away."

A few long leaps brought the noble fellow to the stream, and again Atty saw him stumble as he attempted to clear the little stream. He hastily reloaded, and then started to follow the buck, which he felt sure was badly hurt. "I could not have missed him at that distance," he said, "and, oh, it is my first deer. I must get him. Come along 'Dime'."
