HOW MIKE MADE TWENTY DOLLARS.

The Deal of a Chicago Bunko Sharp in the Days Before the Big Fire.

Before the fire of 1871 there lived in Chicago a noted bunko sharp named Mike O'Mara. He is now serving time at Columbus, O., but in those days he was known to the police as a shining light of buncoism.

One day in 1869 he went into the saloon of a West Side Irishman who prided himself on his knowledge of money. Mike threw down a dirty looking dollar and called for rye. The barkeeper picked up the coin and examined it closely.

"Sure, an it's bad, Mike," said he. "Betcher ten it ain't," answered Mike quick as a wink, pulling out a bill and slapping it down on the counter. After looking at Mike's bill a moment the saloon man took a ten dollar note from his drawer and laid it on the other.

"Who'll decide?" he asked.

"Cashier of the bank 'round in Halsted street," answered Mike. The two tens were handed to one of Mike's friends, and the trio, followed by a curious crowd, went over to the bank. When they got there the saloon man planked the dollar before the teller and said:

"Don't you call that counterfeit?"

"No," was answered after a brief examination. It is perfectly good.

"I don't believe you," cried the saloon man angrily. "Tain't worth a dime."

The teller flushed, and silently turning to a stack of coin raked off a dollar and handing it to the other said:

"Is that good?"

"Yes," was the answer.

"Then keep it, and I will take this other in its place." That of course downed the saloon man, and Mike won. As he was about to put the bills in his pocket he stopped and began an eager examination of one of them. It was, in fact, the ten he had put up. Turning to his opponent, he asked:
