When young Wellington became a de-camp to Lord Westmoreland, his acquaintance with the usages of society was as limited as could well be possessed by any lad who had passed through the ordeal of a public school. Moore, the poet, who visited Dublin shortly before me, and who lived in much the same society as myself, alludes in his journal to the character for frivolity which young Wellesley had acquired while a member of the vice royal staff.

 Two Castles in India.
 The Rock Veddhahs are stunted, hideous and filthy; they live in secluded caves and holes; they eat bats and rats, and make their scanty clothing from the bark of trees, but the Singalese regard them as of the very highest caste, and it would be no disgrace for a woman of good social position to marry a Rock Veddhah. On the other hand, the very greatest disgrace that could be inflicted on such a woman would be to marry her to a Rodiyah, although these last are a race distinguished for beauty, at least in youth, and gentle and innocent by nature.
 The Rodiyahs cannot enter a temple or a village; they are forbidden to till the soil or draw water from a well; they cannot build a house or divide a burden into two bundles; their shadow must not fall on a stream, lest it be polluted; no member of another caste may touch them without disgrace, yet any one may shoot them without blame. All this is supposed to be in consequence of the act of an ancestor two thousand years ago who inveigled a king into eating human flesh. As a consequence the beautiful race is at the foot of the social scale, the ugly and repulsive at the top.--T. W. Higginson in Harper's Bazar.

How a Painting Was Recovered.
 A painting of the infant Jesus in the possession of a New York family has a curious history. It was sold to a member of the family many years ago, and the merchant declared his belief that it was a Guido Rene, although he was too honest to certify to the fact. Years later the purchaser saw in a print shop an engraving of a madonna and child and recognized a reproduction of a part of his picture. He turned the picture over to a cleaner of oil paintings, and the latter, on taking off the frame, discovered a part of the canvas doubled upon itself. Spreading out the whole canvas he began to scrape at the point where, according to the engraving, the madonna should be. In due time he was rewarded, for the madonna's face appeared, and the painting was plainly the original of the engraving. The latter was labeled as being Guido Rene. Chicago Herald.

Encouraging Bright Sayings.
 The way to promote originality in children is to leave the mind as long as possible in direct and living contact with things, and to do that it is necessary to avoid any great appearance of interest in or astonishment at the judgments the child forms or the phrases it uses. As soon as the child begins to find its own opinions interesting, instead of, as before, finding things interesting, farewell to originality.
 Will any one say that if girls were taught how the minds of children might be kept fresh they would not value the knowledge and when the time came try to turn it to account? We heartily think so.--Popular Science Monthly.

Not as Bad as Reported.
 A curious and rather startling misprint appeared in all the papers of Moscow the other day. In describing the reception of the czar at Kiel they state that in the evening, as the Russian imperial yacht left the harbor, the Germans let play their "electrical stone throwers." It appears that the word "Steinwerfer"--stone throwers--was somehow substituted for the proper word, "Scheinwerfer," or reflectors.--Cor. London News.

TOO ACCOMPLISHED.
 Story of a Runaway Parrot from Which a Moral Might Be Derived.
 Said a bird dealer the other day: "Some of these birds you see are old friends of mine. I have them summer after summer, and I know them and they know me. Do you see this parrot here? There's a funny story connected with him, which perhaps you would like to hear. His mistress is a good deal of a traveler, and she used to take the bird everywhere she went. He has been succeeded in her affections to a large extent by a younger and handsomer bird, and now spends a good deal of his time with me. She took him to Brazil once, and there he escaped and flew away into the trees, where he joined a flock of his own kind.
 "His mistress was in despair. She hired a dozen natives to hunt Jacko, and it would have been easy for them to capture him if it had not been for the watchfulness of the wild flock, who would detect the hunters long before Jacko could, and would fly away in alarm and the domesticated bird would follow. They chased him all the forenoon about the plantation, from one grove to another, but when it was time for the noonday siesta not a native could be persuaded to go a step farther. The best that could be done was for his mistress to keep watch herself of Jacko's movements until the Indians would consent to take up the hunt again. This she decided to do.
 "Secreting herself in a little knot of trees, of whose berries the parrots were exceedingly fond, she waited quietly. Before long the flock came clattering and jabbering down on the trees and her beloved Jacko was among them. The birds had been chased so much all morning that they had not had time to eat or to get acquainted with their new arrival. So after a good meal on the berries they began to inspect Jacko. The bird, who had lived a solitary life for years, seemed delighted to get among companions again and as if to give them a treat for their hospitality and also show off some of his accomplishments he began to shout, 'Jacko wants a cracker! a cracker!' But before he could finish all his companions had flown away shrieking in terror.
 "Jacko flew after them, but they would not let him come up with them at all. They were of course much swifter on the wing than the fat runaway, and they soon left him out of sight. When the bird saw that he was avoided by his newly found mates, he could not tell why, he hopped dejectedly awhile among the branches and before long listened to the coaxing of his mistress, and flying back to her shoulder, rubbed his head in her hair, saying 'Poor Jacko! poor Jacko!' in a way which was really pathetic."--New York Tribune.
