The legitimate drama, as Davenport and Forrest understood it, has no place on the stage today. The tastes of the theatergoers nowadays are very strongly in favor of light and almost farcical comedy, and the most serious moods do not descend deeper than society plays.

Although often the exaggerations which often characterize stories about the compensation given to great artists, the London News is disposed to credit the assertion that Mme. Patti will receive $202,500 for her next year's American tour, or $4,500 apiece for forty-five concerts.

Many relics of the Cabots, the early English voyagers to America, will be exhibited at the exposition by a committee formed for that purpose in Bristol, England, where the Cabots lived.
An international chess congress in connection with the World's fair is being advocated, and may be accounted a certainty, as some of the most influential chess associations and clubs are strongly in favor of the idea.
The $500,000 World's fair appropriation which Greece has made will be devoted in large part to the preparation for exhibit of reproductions in cast of the many famous specimens of ancient Greek art now owned by the government.
Visitors to the exposition will be able to go comfortably and expeditiously from one part of the grounds to another and obtain advantageous views of the buildings. They may do this either in electric boats through the lagoons or by the intramural elevated electric railway.

THE CHAMPION MEAN MAN.
A Swell Man Who Bought a Half Ton of Coal and Had It Put In.
He was a thoroughly mad man as he emerged from the basement entrance of a stylish three story stone front house in one of the most fashionable residence districts in the city.
He was a coal heaver, or rather a coal putter in, and evidently a good, hard working, industrious man, and his muttering and grumbling as he passed me after leaving the house roused my curiosity, so I asked him what was the matter.
The coal heaver let out a few strong words by way of beginning and then related the following tale of distress:
"There's a good tale the matter," said he, vehemently. "The matter is that the man that would skin a flea for the hide was generous compared with the turk that I've just been working for. Plow that you think he done? Ordered a half a ton of coal an man to put it in. Well, I was sent from the yard to do the job, an I kem up here all the way from—street and—avenue (a distance of fully 2½ miles, mostly uphill, ready to do the work). There wasn't much doin' round the yard today, an I was glad to get a chance to make even fifteen cents."
"Well, when the cart arrived at the dure this old yank kem out an sez he, 'Are you the man that's to put in the coal?' 'I am,' sez I. 'Well,' sez he, 'go into the kitchen an fetch out a few pails of water an sprinkle the coal before it's dumped out av the cart.' I never heard av such a thing before, but I went in an carried out four pails of water an threw it over the half ton of coal in the cart; then he towled the driver to be very careful in dumpin it on the walk, and when it was dumped, he kem me bring out three more pails of water to lay any dust that might happen to be swimmin' around in the water. I threw on it before, an then I axed him had he'er an empty barrel handy. 'I haven't,' sez he. 'Well,' sez I, 'I'll impty the ash barrel in the street, and when I have the coal put in, I kin put the ashes back in it.' 'Oh, no, you won't,' sez he. 'Well, I had to go over to some buildin' an borry a barrel to put in the coal in.' While I was puttin it in the cellar he stood over me, watchin' every lump as I put it in the barrel, for fear I'd ate some of it, I suppose, but, thank God, I had me dinner at noon-time, an I wasn't hungry."
"When I had all the half ton of coal dumped in the cellar he kem me bring the barrel down an move it over to the cellar, an then I had to carry a lot more water down an sprinkle it all over again, wid the old glibbo stanin' over me all the time. Begorra, 'twas enough to discourage the coal from burnin' at all, an I had so much cold weather in the cellar he stood over me, watchin' every lump as I put it in the barrel, for fear I'd ate some of it, I suppose, but, thank God, I had me dinner at noon-time, an I wasn't hungry."

"Then, when it was all over, I sez to him, 'Well, I'd like to have me pay for me work.' 'Oh,' sez he, 'I always pay at the yard for the puttin in at the same time as I pay for the coal; ye'll get the fifteen cents at the office when you go back.' Well, when he said that I got so disgusted that I left him without sayin a word. Here it is half past six on a Saturday night, an I med very little today, an I need that fifteen cents, but the yard is closed an I can't get till Monday mornin'.
The tears were almost in the poor fellow's eyes as he finished and I left him at the corner, and as I thought over his misfortune the story of the man in Chicago who is so mean that he uses a wart on the back of his neck to save the expense of a collar button faded into insignificance alongside the true story of quintessence meanness.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Cupidity Triumphed.
A woman got on the car the other day and as the conductor passed handed her fare up. He did not see her, and it was funny to watch proceedings as she struggled with her desire to be honest and the stronger one to beat the road out of one fare. Cupidity triumphed, however, and with a smile of satisfaction on her face she put the money back and thoroughly enjoyed that ride.—New York Recorder.
