The old school house is slowly moving toward Mr. Mesner's lot. Mr. Mesner is a very silent man, keeps his own council and never talks politics, but for all that it is generally understood that he intends to convert the building into a wagon and blacksmith shop.

CLEARING THE WAY.

Chicago and Boston Unite In a Great Scheme. Scene-The Bunkerill villa, near Boston. Miss Portia Bunkerill, a learned but pretty girl of 18, is entertaining Mr. Lardsley Sugarham of Chicago on the portico. Her father and mother occupy a window near by. Mr. Bunkerill (after a covert but critical survey of the visitor)-Quite a sober and industrious person, I imagine, but his face bespeaks the soul of a pork packer, and his laugh has the timbre of a coster's. I do not understand how a girl of Portia's unquestionable good taste can tolerate a being of such vulgarity. (Resumes the perusal of his Mrs. B. (who has surveyed the field)-Portin is perhaps studying him for a pa-per that the literary society has appointed her to write on the subject of "The Lack of Culture In the West." She can certainly have no other interest in him. I heard her ask him what he thought of Ibsen as a playwright, and he replied that "the show business gave him a pain." (Begins anew on her "Key to Browning.") Portia (on the portico)-All of Ibsen's writings are so very lovely from the standpoint of the earnest investigator of life, though I scarcely think that he has been correctly designated as the Poet of Doubt, do you, Mr. Sugarham?

Mr. Sugarham (emphatically) - Not any. He's all right!

Portia-Have you ever reflected upon his terrible ideas on the subject of love? Mr. Sugarham (reaching after the spirit)-Well, I should smile. I remember the most exciting day we ever had at the slaughter house-the day I told you we killed so many hogs-I stopped right in the middle of it all and thought of this fellow Jibson and his terrible ideas on love.

Mr. Bunkerill (jumping to his feet with a shudder)-Confound the barbarian! I will retire to the library, where I shan't be annoyed by his strident ignorance! (Stalks away from the win-
