Theoretically this would undoubtedly be a desirable reform, which men as well as women would favor, since the usual mixed arrangements are probably not agreeable either to men or women. However, it is to be feared that the plan is not practicable. From a woman's car of this sort conductors, brakemen and all other men would have to be excluded, or else there would be no advantage except to the men in the other cars from which women were excluded, and under our present system of construction this would be impossible. Men would still have to make a thoroughfare of the car in order to carry on the train at all. A separately curtained portion of a car would seem to approach nearer to practicability. As a matter of fact, no serious trouble results from the present system, though it is often inconvenient and disagreeable to both men and women.-Boston Transcript.
