Ninety In the Shade,

-Truth.

Oblivious. It was night. The strains of a waltz from the pavilion and shuffling feet of the merry dancers could be heard on the beach close by. To the left of the dancing platform a long stretch of land lay. dotted here and there with benches for the tired dancers. On the bench close by the water's edge sat a couple closely folded in each oth er's arms. Oblivious to all around they told each other of their love, and now and then the soft sound made by a kiss could be heard echoing over the waters

Time passed by and still they sat, car in little for the fleeeting hours, until finally the girl, placing a tender cares on her companion's cheek, murmured, 'Kerrie, dear, my feet are getting cold.'

"So are mine, sweetheart," was the soothing reply, and a soft kiss was imprinted on her cherry lips. Still they sat on, listening to the murmur of the waves and the echo of the music, when the girl, giving a last fond embrace, murmured again, "Darling, 1 can't stand it any longer. My feet are so cold." They arose, and the man's heart smote him as he realized what was the matter. The flowing tide had come in, passed far The flowing tide had come in, passed far beyond the bench, and they had to wade sand 4, Bush bank building, Salem, Or. out through three inches of water. - Bos ton Globe. From a New Point of View. "I see by the papers, Miss Chitly," said young Chumpington, "that positively there were never seen at Niagara falls so many newly wedded couples as there are this season. "Indeed, Mr. Chumpington!" said Miss Chitly. "How perfectly stupid it must be to others! I can't imagine one looking at a more silly sight than a collection of insipid touring brides. I couldn't abide it!"
