DO ALL THAT YOU CAN.

"I cannot de much," said a little star, To make this dark world bright; My silvery beams cannot pierce far Into the gloom of night; Yet I am a part of God's great plan. And so I will do the best that I can.

"What can be the use," said a fleecy cloud, "Of these few drops that I hold?
They will hardly bend the lify proud.
If caught in her chalice of gold, But I, too, am part of God's great plan, So my treasures I'H give as well as I can."

A child went merrily forth to play, But a thought, like a silver thread, Through the happy golden head—
"Mother said, 'Darling, do all that you can,
For you are a part of God's great plan."

She knew ao more than the twinkling star, Or the cloud with its rain cup full,
How, why or for what all strange things are;
She was only a child at school.
But she thought, "Tis a part of God's great plan That even I should do all that I can."

So she helped another child along When the way was rough to his feet,
And she sang from her heart a little song
That we all thought wondrous sweet,
And her father—a weary, toil worn man—
Said, "I, too, will do the best that I can." -Mrs. M. E. Sangster

THE RIVALS.

Through their own efforts Sang Lumford and Matt King had stocked ranch. The ranch was small, but their cattle were choice and their grass and water were of the best; besides, they were hustlers, and their expenses for hire were very small, which increased their income considerably.

At the time of which we write 50 miles in every direction from where one lived was called a neighborhood in Texas. There were some who increased the distance to 75 and even 100 miles, but these were few, and their ponies were exceptionally good, for the area of a neighborhood then generally covered as much ground as a man could ride over in a day in one direction without too much exertion.

The nearest neighbor to Sang and Matt lived 10 miles away across the river, and there, it is unnecessary to say, they were frequent visitors as long as the floods in the river would allow them to cross over. Mr. Tobin's family was an interesting and rather numerous one, with a lot of girls ranging in age from babyhood to budding maidenhood. For a year Matt and Sang had watched pretty Nellie Tobin grow and bud and blush, until she had become in their eyes the fairest and sweetest little maid that ever lived.

It was not long, therefore, before the two bachelor ranchmen began to look upon each other as rivals for the hand and heart of Nellie. At of Newport on Cave Cove, a beautifully first it was all fun and merriment, the one joking the other about some little advantage he had gained on the previous visit. Meanwhile they invalids. Open all winter. Terms worked all the harder and looked moderate by day or week. Intending after their interests closer, so that worked all the harder and looked when they should bring Nellie home there would be no lack of the wherewithall to make her comfortable and

> It is unnecessary to say perhaps that each had made up his mind to win Nellie for his own, neither one thinking the other had even the smallest chance of getting her.

Then came the spring freshet, and they were confined to their own side of the river-shut out, it seemed to them, from all the rest of the world.

It was then that the first discontent came between them. Both became cross as the proverbial bear, and the least thing that went wrong the one would blame the other. So they had little quarreling spats and were as unhappy as only two unreasoning fellows in love with the same girl could possibly be.

Sang was naturally quiet, with very little resentment in his nature and of very few words. He was big and ungainly, slow in his throughts and movements, but a giant in strength. On Thursday, November 30th, from Usually he was easy to get along with, and there were not a few who, aid society will give a Thanksgiving behind his back said that he was a coward at heart, for there had been times when the tears had sprung to his eyes when some drunken rowdy his great strength and assert him-country again. Matt, on the other hand, was small, quick of motion and fiery in temperament and was considered the most daring rider and the most expert with the lasso of any rancher in that part of the country. He was quick to take offense and as quick to forgive after having eased his mind by pouring out a torrent of words upon the offender. Taken altogether, Sang Lumford and Matt King were just about on an average with men one meets everywhere in everyday life, well suited to each other and likely to make a success of the business in which they might engage, provided they did not fall in love with the same girl at the same time. One day when the river was at its highest, and the two men were as minerable as it is possible for men to be, Matt burst out: "Confound this high water I wish there wasn't a drop of it for a thousand miles large coil of new rope with him,

To this ridiculous wish, which fully into two piles. When this was would virtually break them up in their business, Sang assented. "Huh, huh," he said.

"I bet I'll have Nellie here with me picked up one pile of the rope and before there is another freshet in the hung it carefully over his arm and river." cried Matt.

"Me, too," said Sang. "You?"

"Reckon so, if she'll have me." scornfully.

defiantly at his partner. "D-n you!" roared Sang. "I have taken all I am going to take from shore. you, so you better keep your mouth shut Sang was white in the face as he turned around and walked out of the house. He went to the corral, caught toward the river. Half an hour later Matt also left the house on horseback, but headed farther up the river than Sang had

It was late that night when Sang returned home, dripping wet. He went into the house and looked around, but there was no sign of Matt, and as the latter did not return | terday and when you left me I made Sang soon went to bed and to sleep.

During the night, however, he woke up, and finding that Matt had not yet come back he began to feel in all right. When we were about uneasy and did not close his eyes half way across, a drifting treetop again till morning dawned gray and caught us and got us tangled up.

As the daylight increased so did also the rain, and by the time the sun and so for safety I hung onto the should have been up it was pouring down in torrents. Sang felt ill at ease out through the rain in every direction, hoping he would see Matt returning. Hour after hour he watched and waited in vain, until at last he could stand it no longer and left the house.

As he had done the day before, he rode down toward the river, and as he rode along he muttered to him-

"What a pair of fools we have been to fall out as we did, just for nothing! I wish Matt would come back so that I might teil him."

Then he smiled grimly in his old way, and in spite of the pouring rain rode on toward the river.

"I reckon Matt will flare up like thunder, as is usual with him, when he finds out," he mused. "It was a hard pull to swim across the river yesterday, but it was a good thing Matt made me mad, or I wouldn't be able to do it today, after all this rain: Lordy! What a joke it will be on Matt, and he so sure that Nellie would jump right into his arms, too, as soon as he asked her!" The water was roaring down every gully and ravine and went rushing toward the river, swelling it every moment. As Sang approached the river he could hear the angry roar of the water as it forced its way over and through the "raft" of uprooted trees and drift that had lodged in the bend below the ranch and had grown steadily for perhaps hundreds o

When Sang reached the river, he was surprised to see how it had rise: since the day before. Old logs and trees came whirling down the might, flood, spinning round and round in the eddies before being hurled against and over the raft, a little distance be

The water was rushing over every thing, and only one huge tree, which had lodged in the raft with its root in the air, was visible above it Among the roots, which seemed to writhe and twist like serpents in the still pouring rain, Sang thought be could see something move and gos ticulate, and a faint cry reached his ears above the roar of the water.

"Dang my picture if that ain' Matt," he shouted, unsonscious o the loud tone he used. "On his way to see Nellie, I bet. Little good would do him, and I would tell him so pretty quick if I could just reac

Matt was weak and worn from long exposure and anxiety and submitted quietly to everything Sang proposed. When all was ready, they let themselves down into the water and in a few minutes were safely landed by the current against the

The evening sun was shining brightly when Matt awoke from a sound sleep much refreshed.

English Hatred of Gladstone. The hatred of Gladstone is almost universal among the upper and upper middle classes in England. This hatred, too, finds expression in a violence of language which is seldom met with in any country except during a period of revolution or civil war, and has long been banished from English social and political life. One hears him in the best circles treated as an old villain, for whom capital punishment would be too good, and frantic desire for his death is openly uttered. That "G. O. M." stands for "God's Only Mistake" is one of the grim jokes of the Conservative clubs, and old ladies will avow their willingness to walk miles with peas in their shoes to see him hanged. Stories of his abandoned profligacy are of course not generally told in public, the subject being a delicate one, but they are a very prominent part of the Gladstone legend, Hair Death instantly removes and forever destroys objectionable hair, whether upon the hands,
