THIS WHALE IS LOADED.

With a Dangerous Botub Under Ills Hids. He Challenges All Comers. The steam whaler Beluedere arrived from a yoar's whaling cruise Wednesday with only five special and right whales to her credit. When she left port last December, she wont in search of sperm whales in the South seas, but with poor success. The first one that the crows in the tonic get within reach of was near the Schewich Islands. It ras a monsion sparm whale, and all five confs put off in pursuit of it. One that was commanded by Mate Philip Cook crept up to within range of it, and a bomb to which a line was attached was successfully fired into it, but the explosives with which the bomb was charged failed to work. Away the whale went, skimming along at a frightful rate just under the surface and lashing the water into foam in his agony. The long line was soon run out, but its end was securely fastened to the boat, and the frail craft was soon flying along in tow of the whale. The monster did not seem to relish being made a tugboat of, and he stopped and turned on his pursuers. For a moment he watched the occupants of he small boat again slowly creeping apon him. When about half of the inervening space had been covered, the whale suddenly flipped his huge tail in the air and went under the surface of Zie ocean. A moment later he rose within a few yards of the beat and went at it with a rush, his huge jaws open and showing every indication that a whale can of anger. Before another shot could be fired the monster rolled get' over and caught the boat between his jaws. There was a crashing of timbers, and all the crew but one went flounder-'ng in the wake. The missing man was Andrew Cook, and he sat in the bow of the boat just where the great jaws came ogether. It is supposed that he was caken in the whale's mouth, and as the aouster sank after his attack the man was carried down far below the surface and did not come up again. The men in the other boats arrived
