Ice Gorge in the Columbia River.

PORTLAND, Dec. 2.—A great jam of ice has formed in the Columbia, above the mouth, of the Willamette, and now extends past Vancouver and many miles up the river. The ice was brought down from the upper river by the current, and accumulated off Vancouver, forming a gorge of wedged and jamed ice cakes, carried at every conceivable angle, that is daily extending farther up the river. There is still open water between Shaw's island and the Oregon side, through which the loose ice is carried into the river below.
