

CHRISTMAS EVE.

(FOR THE JOURNAL.)

In the heavens above us tonight;
In the stillness of the glad star light,
The cherubs are singing once again,
"Peace on earth and good will to man."
Tis the old, old greeting, yet ever new,
This beautiful song they sing to you.
"Peace on earth" Ah sweetly they sing;
Like bells on the air, their voices ring.
"Good will to man"—to all alike,
They sing their glad song to-night.

"Why the Chimes Rang."

[A Christmas Wonder Story, by Raymond M. Alden. Copyright Kindergarten Literature Co.]

There was once, in a far-away country where few people have ever traveled, a wonderful church. It stood on a high hill in the midst of a great city, and every Sabbath, and on sacred days like Christmas, thousands of people climbed the hill to its great archways looking like long lines of ants all moving in the same direction.

When you came to the building itself you found stone columns and dark passageways, and a grand entrance leading to the main room of the church. This room was so long that one standing at the doorway could scarcely see the other end where the choir and the ministers sat near the marble altar. At the further corner was the organ, which was so loud that when it began to play the people for miles 'round would close their shutters and prepare for a storm, thinking they heard the thunder. Altogether, there was no such church ever seen as this one, especially when it was lighted up for some festival, and crowded with people young and old.

But the strangest thing about the whole building was the wonderful chime of bells. There stood at one corner of the church a gray stone tower, with ivy growing over it as far up as one could see. As far as one could see, I said, for the tower was quite great enough to fit the great church, and it reached so far into the sky that it was only in fair weather that one claimed to be able to see the top, and even then there were but few who thought it was within sight. Up, and up, and up climbed the stones and the ivy, and as the men who built the church had been dead for hundreds of years, everyone had forgotten how high the tower was supposed to be.

Now all the wise people knew that at the top of the tower was a chime of Christmas bells. They had rung there ever since the church was finished, and were the most beautiful bells in the world. Some thought it was because a great musician had cast them and arranged them in their place, and others said it was because of great height, reaching up to where the air was clear and pure; however this may be, no one who had heard the chimes ever denied that they were the sweetest in the world. Some described them as sounding like angels far up in the sky, and others like strange winds singing through the trees.

But the fact was no one had heard them for years and years. There was an old man living not far from the church who said he remembered that his mother had spoken of hearing them when she was a little girl, and he was the only one who could say as much as that. They were Christmas chimes, I said, and were not meant to be played by men or on common occasions. On Christmas Eve all the people of the city brought to the church their offerings to the Christ-child, and when the greatest and best offering was laid on the altar there would come sounding through the music of the choir the voices of the Christmas chimes up in the tower. Some said the wind rang them, and others that they were so high that the angels could set them swinging. But for many long years, as I said before, they had never been heard. The ministers said that people had been growing less careful of their gifts for the Christ-child, or gave them rather to make a display for their own honor than for love of him, so that no offering was brought good enough to deserve the music of the chime. Still every Christmas Eve the rich people of the city crowded to the altar, each one trying to give some better gift than anyone else, without taking anything that he wanted to keep for himself; and the church was filled with those who thought that perhaps the wonderful bell would be heard again. But at long last the music was sweet and the offering were plenty, only the roar of the wind could be heard far up in the old stone tower.

Now a number of miles from the city, in a little country village, where nothing could be seen of the great church save glimpses of the tower when the weather was fine, lived a boy named Pedro and his little brother. They knew very little about Christmas chimes, but they had heard of the service in the church on Christmas Eve, and had a secret plan that they had often talked over when by themselves, for going to the beautiful celebration. "Nobody can guess, Little Brother," Pedro would say, "all the fine things there are to see and hear in the church; and I have even heard it said that the Christ child himself sometimes comes down to the meeting. What if we would see him?"

The day before Christmas was bitterly cold with a few lonesome snowflakes flying in the air, and a hard white crust on the ground. Sure enough, Pedro and Little Brother were able to slip quietly away early in the afternoon, on their way to the Christmas celebration; and although the walking was hard in the frosty air before daylight they had trudged so far, hand in hand that they saw the lights of the big city just ahead of them. Indeed, they were about to enter one of the great gates that surrounded it, when they saw something dark on the snow near their path, and stepped aside to look at it.

It was a poor woman who had fallen just outside the city, too sick and tired and cold to side the city, too sick and tired and cold to get in where she might have found shelter. The snow made a sort of pillow for her, and she would soon have been asleep in the wintry air that no one could ever awaken her again. All this Pedro saw in a moment, and he knelt down beside her and tried to rouse her, even urging at her arm a little as if he would try to carry her away. He turned her face toward him, so that he could rub some of the snow on it, and then, when he had looked at her intently for a moment, he stood up and said:

"It's no use, Little Brother. You will have to go on alone."

"Alone!" cried Little Brother. "And you will not see the Christmas festival?"

"No," said Pedro; and he could not help little choking sound of disappointment in his throat. "See this poor woman; her face looks like the Madonna in the chapel window, and she will freeze to death if no one cares for her. You can bring some one to help her when you come back, and I can keep her alive. Both of us need not miss the celebration; it would better be I. You can easily find your way to the church; and you must see and hear everything twice, Little Brother—once for you and once for me. I am sure the Christ-child must know how I would love to come and worship him; and oh! if you get a chance, Little Brother, to slip up to the altar without getting anyone's way, take this little silver piece of mine and lay it down for my offering, when no one is looking. Don't forget the place where you left me, and forgive me for not going with you as I would like."

In this way he hurried off Little Brother to the city, and winked hard to keep back the tears as he heard the chimes ringing and ringing farther and farther away in the darkness. It was all so hard, to lose the music and the splendor of the celebration that he had planned for so long, to lose the chance of offering his own silver piece that he had saved for the Christ-child, and spend the time instead in the lonesome snow outside the city wall. But it never occurred to him that he could leave the poor Madonna to freeze without his help.

The great church was truly a wonderful place that night. Everyone said it had never looked so bright and beautiful before. When the organ played, and the thousands of people sang the hymn, the walls shook with the sound, and Little Pedro, outside the wall of the city, felt the earth tremble all around him. At last came the procession to hear the offerings to the altar; when great and rich men marched proudly up to lay down their gifts to the Christ-child. Some brought wonderful jewels, some baskets of gold so heavy that they could scarcely carry them down the aisle; a great writer laid down a book that he had been making for years and years; and last walked the king of the country, hoping with all the rest to win for himself the chime of the Christmas bells. There was a great murmur through that church as the people saw the king take from his head the royal crown all set with diamonds and other precious stones—lay gleaming on the altar as his offerings to the holy Child. "Surely," said everyone, "we shall hear the bells now, for nothing like this has ever happened before." And they all stood still to listen but only the cold old wind was heard in the stone tower; and the people shook their heads, some of them saying, as they had done before, that they never really believed the story of the chimes, and doubted if they ever rang at all.

The procession was over; the gifts were all on the altar, and the choir had begun the closing hymn. Suddenly the organist stopped playing as though he had been shot, and everyone looked at the old minister, who was standing in his place and holding up his hand for silence. Not a sound could be heard from anyone in the church, but as all the people strained their ears to listen, there came softly but distinctly swinging through the air, the sound of the bells in the tower. So far away and yet so clear seemed the music, so much sweeter were the notes than anything that had been heard before, rising and falling away up there in the sky, that the people in the church sat for a moment as still as though something held each of them by the shoulders. Then they all stood up together and stared straight at the altar, to see what great gift had awakened the long silent bells.

But all that the nearest of them saw was the childish figure of Little Brother, who had crept softly down the aisle when no one was looking, and had laid Pedro's little piece of silver on the altar.

FREE TO EVERY MAN.

The Method of a Great Treatment for Weakness of Men.

Which Cured Him After Everything Else Failed.

Painful diseases are bad enough, but when a man is slowly wasting away with nervous weakness, the mental forebodings are ten times more than the most severe pain. There is no sleep up to the mental suffering day or night. Sleep is almost impossible and under such a strain men are scarcely responsible for what they do. For years the writer rolled and tossed on the troubled sea of a sexual weakness until it was a question whether he had not better take a dose of poison and thus end all his troubles. But providential inspiration came to his aid in the shape of a combination of medicines that not only completely restored the general health, but enlarged his weak and emaciated parts to natural size and vigor, and he now declares that any man who will take the trouble to send his name and address may have the benefit of this wonderful treatment free. Now when I say free I mean absolutely without cost, because I want every weakened man to get the benefit of my experience.

I am not a philanthropist, nor do I pose as an enthusiast, but there are thousands of men suffering the tortures of weakened manhood who would be cured at once could they but get such a remedy as the one that cured me. Do not try to study out how I can afford to pay the few postage stamps necessary to mail the information, but send for it and learn what they cost nothing to get they are clear as a fortune to some men and mean to mean of happiness to most of us. Write a Thomas Slater, Box 390, Kalamazoo, Mich., and the information will be mailed in a plain sealed envelope.
