He writes favoring an isthmain canal, upon the subject, Mr. Carnegie says: "Much has been said about the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as if treaties were eternal. It is the common practice to denounce treaties when conditions change. Mr. Blaine held the only true While he was with me in Lonon there was a dinner, with some of the leading statesmen of Britain present, among them Mr. Chamberlain. The conversation turned upon Mr. Blaine's you the gist of the conversation :

"Mr. Blaine, you have not been friendly to England." "I don't see why you should say so I have been always friendly to England." You did not show it in the correspondence about the Clayton-Bulwer

Well, when I read the correspondence between the two countries I und Her Majesty was always telling the President what she expected, and the President was telling her what he ventured to hope. When I replied, I told tigation of both sides of a case are to be Her Majesty what the President ex-"Ah, you admit then that you changed

"'Not more than conditions had changed, Mr. Blaine replied. 'When the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was negotiated we were a small, weak country, and expected to borrow the money to build the canal from you; now we do not ask for your money and we have grown greater in population than Great Britain. Gentlemen, the Republic is past the stage of venturing to hope when any other nation tells us what it expects. But if Her Majesty ever ventures to hope, we rhall not fail to be as courteous, and venture to hope in return.'
"It is unsafe for the United States to allow the slightest participation or the shadow of foundation for a claim to participation in anything pertaining to this continent: far better no canal than one under the Hay-Panncefote treaty. But we will have a canal. Britain needs only to see that we are in earnest and resolved that it shall be American and
