BANK OFFICIALS COMMIT SUICIDE

Both Shot with same Revolver one Mile from Vancouver After Confessing their Guilt

Charles Brown and E. L. Canby president and chairman respectively of the defunct First National Bank of Vancouver, Wash., are dead. Upon discovery of their crime by bank examiner Maxwell, they confessed appropriating the bank's money and after discussing the conditions of the bank they remarked that there was nothing for them to do but to kill themselves and taking a revolver they went through the town to the north and were seen no more until their bodies were found Sunday morning.

Mr. Maxwell placed guards at different points to prevent their leaving the city and sent for the U. S. District Attorney, Judge A. L. Miller of the Supreme court of Clark county issued a warrant for the arrest of the two men and a searching party was organized. Thinking the men had walked to Kalama to take the train to Puget Sound the party started in that direction and about one mile from the city the search ended by the bodies being found.

The bodies were facing each other, Canby's leaning against a stump, and Brown's against a small thicket. Their feet were not two feet apart. The revolver which ended both their lives was in Brown's hand, showing that Canby died first; that he shot himself in Brown's presence, and that Brown, after waiting to see whether or not the shot was fatal, reached over and taking the gun from his friend's lifeless hand, ended his own life.

Nothing was wanting to complete the ghastly coincidence. Both men shot themselves in the mouth. After the blood was washed away, not a mark was discernible on the body of either. A slight discoloration back of Canby's left ear showed that the bullet in his head had almost but not quite reached the surface.

It's a Delusion Fondly cherished by the uninitiated that, because they see better with a certain pair of glasses, their eyes have been improved. Perhaps—perhaps not. The only safe course is to have your eyes examined by an expert, just as a right glasses prescribed, just the right sort fitted. We claim to do just exactly that, and dozens of people will prove it.
