It takes a man with a double-jointed Philadelphia lawyer think-plant to keep track of the Gilbert Brothers bank failure, with its two receiverships and 33 lawyers, pulling and hanling away at what remains. It is now discovered that among the valuable assets that were left lying about handy for preferred creditors to help themselves to on short notice, there was a firebrick claybank worth $50,000, and it is to be presumed that the only reason some of the gentlemen with a burning desire to protect the depositors didn't carry that off was because it was not portable. If it had been a residence or a piano, "this $50,-000 item" would have been among the choses in action or some other intangible abstraction and non-get-at-ible Now fortunately it remains with other rhinestone jewelry resources, out which "it is believed all the creditors will be paid in full." Why in the mischief they couldn't have just as well discovered a gravel bank worth a hundred thousand dollars and have paid the creditors some dividends? It might have been a gold mine on the Santiam with millions in it and could all have been turned over to the school fund and have provided free libraries for the school children just as well as to give them ta little measly $50,000 claybank ing its mental machinery over Labor item to read about. But for fear some Day and the problems of Capital and of the gentlemen who are handing out Labor.
