The Capital of Oregon A School City

The Journal presents a page of announcements of Salem educational institutions all maintained upon their merits and without support from public taxation.

All the professions are represented in these schools, from the law to theology, from music to bookkeeping, from medicine to oratory, from nursing to journalism. Especially are these schools many and strong for teaching English.

The ancient and modern languages, the natural sciences and arts, including needlework and embroidery, are all in the scope of the faculties of these colleges and academies.

Their catalogs would make one of the most interesting compilations showing the advancement of civilization. These schools are all devoted to culture on a broad and liberal scale.

Business education has reached a high standard of excellence and young men are sent out from this city to take positions in the banks and commercial institutions of the entire state.

The law schools of this city are so situated in the proximity of the courts and the legislature that they graduate lawyers of splendid equipment to take up an active practice at once.

The medical schools have the advantage of the presence of hospitals and state institutions that furnish clinics for observation and surgery and graduate physicians from Salem are practicing in many states.

In vocal and instrumental music the equipment at Salem is stronger than in any city of the northwest. Music teachers are sent out of this city equipped for teaching classes and do succeed elsewhere.

Education is taught here as in few other cities, upon a high plane of literary culture, and far beyond the mere mechanical recitation plan that bores audiences and leaves the performer without satisfaction.

School teachers get a finer preparation at Salem than in the big normal school cities of the East or West, because the normal schools here must exist upon their merits in competition with state-aided schools.

Salem will become more and more the home of great educators, and men and women who devote their lives to the development of ability and character in others will find this a congenial city of residence.

The labors of educators are never repaid in money as they deserve. But it is worth something to live in a community where educational interests are in the ascendancy and where thousands are being trained to make the most of themselves.

The largest educational institution at the Capital City has for years been handicapped with debt. This is being wiped out, a large endowment is being raised, and drier timber and worn-out methods are being dropped.

In five years it will have nearly a thousand students enrolled under progressive methods and all other Salem schools will feel the impulse and double their attendance. There is room for all and need of all.

There is room at Salem for still other schools, for a school of forestry, for a school of mines, for a school of geography, a school of journalism and correspondence schools.

The time will come when all these institutions clustering around this city as a common center, will be supplied by this community with a grand library in a beautiful building in the center of the city, a consolidation of all the present libraries, arranged and classified and supported by the state, city and county.

Such a library building will some day stand in the avenue between the state house and the government building, and will contain the state law library and all the large libraries now in the city but not accessible to the general public or to the students who need them so much.

The Journal school page does not include the public schools with nearly fifteen hundred students, the Indian school with six hundred, nor the various state schools located at Salem.

There is all between three and four thousand young people and children receiving an education in some branch or other at Salem, and there are several hundred persons making a living teaching.

All the food and clothing and other living expenses of these students and teachers are defrayed in this community and make Salem a good home market city.

From a moral and business standpoint the Salem educational institutions are strong bulwarks of the community and we bespeak for them generous treatment and the consideration to which they are entitled upon their respective merits.

In every particular an exhibition of artistic merit without a parallel Greater Salem Mid-Summer Carnival—June 29—July 4.

A Western Show Operator.
E. J. Arnold, the sole proprietor of the Oregon Pacific and Oriental Carnival shows which are to be a feature of the Greater Salem Mid-Summer Carnival, is an Oregon man, and has named his show partly in honor of his state. He has in the past few years grown into the show business like a mushroom in the night until he is the veritable Barnum of the West. What is best of all about his exhibitions and himself is the fact that he is a thorough gentleman, and that he allows nothing but clean, deserving and desirable features to appear with his multitudinous attractions. Salem is to be congratulated upon securing his entertainments for this most brilliant occasion.

Artistic celebrities from everywhere, the kings and queens of the charmed circle from every civilized country on the globe, introducing innumerable feats entirely new to America.

The leading performers of every nation. The most wonderful animals ever seen. The crowned champions of both hemispheres.

The greatest grandest jubilee occasion of sight seeing ever offered.

A season of festivity, mirth, music, and merriment will reign supreme.

A great universal exposition of wonderland.
