ORDINANCE PROVES DEFECTIVE

Bonham and Martin Who Were Employed to Prosecute Recommend Dismissed

Messrs. Bonham & Martin, who were employed by Judge Judah to prosecute the cases against Eugene Eckerlen and Frank P. Talkington, filed an opinion in the city council last evening that will take the cases recently instituted against these gentlemen out of court with a sickening thud. After investigating the matter thoroughly the attorneys found that the ordinance which defendants were charged with violating is in bad shape, and recommended that the cases be dismissed. The opinion in full is as follows:

"Since being retained, this morning, to represent the interests of the city of Salem in the cases of the City of Salem vs. F. P. Talkington and Eugene Eckerlen, charged with keeping open their respective saloons on Sunday, contrary to the provision of city ordinance No. 318, we have, after careful consideration of the provisions of said ordinance and the laws applicable thereto, come to the conclusion that said ordinance is so fatally defective that such proceedings cannot be safely based upon the same.

"It is well established by the law governing criminal proceedings that the accused is entitled to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him, before he can be compelled to answer the same. By carefully reading section 7 of city ordinance 297, as amended by city ordinance No. 318, it will be observed that several misdemeanors are named and jumbled together with a single penalty for all, but no one separately. For instance, said section apparently attempts to denounce the sale, without a license, of spirituous, vinous and malt liquors in less quantities than one gallon, by a certain class of persons or dealers. It is next made an offense to sell or give liquor to an intoxicated person or to a common drunkard, and a clause in the section apparently intends to prohibit the sale or giving away of the different kinds of liquors on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, and lastly, a prohibition against the keeping open of a barroom, saloon or tipping house on Sunday, following which is an attempt to prescribe a penalty for the violation of the prohibited acts in this language: 'And any person violating the provisions of this section, shall, upon conviction, be punished, etc.' The provisions of section 7, above referred to, being numerous, it appears to us that it would be difficult for any one to say just which one of the prohibited acts the penalty prescribed is intended to cover, if in deed it can be said to cover any one separately.

"And we respectfully suggest that it would be hazardous for the city of Salem to attempt to proceed under said ordinance in its present condition, and we sincerely believe that the ends of justice and the maintenance of law and order will be best subserved by dismissing the proceedings already instituted under said ordinance No. 318, and above referred to, in order that said ordinance may be carefully revised and amended so as to make its provisions and the penalties for a violation of each of the prohibited acts definite and certain.

"Respectfully yours,
"BONHAM & MARTIN."
