Kelly, as "Dan O'Hara," the Kerry Gow, carried that role in a manner, which "those who know" whisper was quite on a par with Mr. Murphy's interpretation of the witty blacksmith. Most of the rest of the cast, probably owing to the changes caused by Mr. Murphy's illness, were sadly deficient in their lines, and several times the voice of the prompter "off stage" was audible in the audience. In due respect to the company, however, the fact that many had gone to

LOCAL OPTION LAW

The Jayne Bill to Amend Passes the House

Rollcall After a Very Warm Debate Shows a Close Vote

Tuesday at 2 o'clock the Jayne bill to amend the local option law adopted last November. There was a large attendance in the lobbies. Mr. Kay, after the bill was read, offered a substitute for the Jayne bill, which, he said, had been prepared by the friends of the Local Option League. The Jayne bill was before the committee on revision of laws for three weeks, and the local option friends declined all efforts to amend. They denied that the legislature had any right to amend this law.

The Jayne bill requires 30 per cent of voters to bring an election in any precinct, to be wholly outside of any incorporated city or town. Shall not prohibit prescriptions by a regular practicing physician of alcoholic stimulants. Elections are to be held under this act in June of odd years. Mr. Jayne opposes holding the prohibition election at same time as other elections are held. Mr. Jayne contends for the precinct local option, and for leaving the question in cities to their local government.

McLeod of Union argued against the Kay substitute. It was an effort to defer, to strangle by delay, a bill which they had not the hardihood to even try to amend in committee. No compromise was offered until the last moment, when it was too late.

Kay said it was not too late to amend. And what right had the legislature to amend an act of the people? The Jayne bill was ten times worse than the original law, and his substitute was an attempt to make the Jayne bill fair. He opposed a special election next June, as it would bring up a great deal of animosity and hard feeling. He denied being a Prohibitionist. He had incurred the enmity of the liquor interests by standing up for the rights of the people. He attacked the proposition that the entire precinct should be outside of an incorporated city or town. He favored a compromise, and wanted his substitute to go to the committee.

Brigham of Lane said the local optionists had an opportunity to go before the committee. It was not a good thing to vote on these most partisan matters at a general election. He denied that the local option law had been enacted by the people. A few imported agitators and extremists at Portland had foisted this iniquitous law on the people.

Muir of Multnomah said every opportunity had been offered to amend the local option law before the committee, but no friend of Prohibition could be induced to come before that committee. Now those who had regarded the act adopted by the people as sacred came here with a sweeping amendment. He did not believe in the principle that the legislature had not the right to amend that law, or any law. The Jayne bill was a fair bill, and the local option law was unfair in every feature of it.

Capron of Portland spoke of the necessity of righting a wrong done to an interest that was entitled to recognition. He had spent more years in Y. M. C. A. work and church work than many champions of local option. He had lived in two states that enacted prohibition, and it had not tended to peace, order and brotherly love. He had a petition of 30,000 citizens asking for the Jayne law to be enacted. The petitioners were mostly business men of good standing.

Smith of Josephine favored a compromise that would save the special election, costing $40,000 or $50,000. This was not done to cause delay, but to enable the law to come up before the people in the regular order.

Newell of Washington favored the substitute. If the opponents of the bill were not afraid to meet a compromise, let them refer the bill.

Baily said it would cost as much to hold elections under the local option law as the entire cost of this special election. We had a right to suspect the fairness of the local option advocates. The Jayne bill was in substance a re-enactment of the Brannock law. Thirty per cent was too small, but was the same for both sides, which their law never permitted.

Edwards of Lane opposed recommitting the question next June. He believed that the country and town had a joint interest in this matter. Why cut a precinct in two to submit this matter any more than for any other? Kay demanded a roll call on this question, and the house refused to refer by a vote of 37 to 22, one absent. For Kay substitute—Barnes, Caldwell, Calvert, Carter, Cavender, Cole, Cornett, Donnelly, Edwards, Flint, Jackson, Kay, Kune, Mears, Miles, Munkers, Newell, Richie, Settlemier, Smith of Josephine, Vawter, West—22.

Against Kay substitute—Bailey, Bingham, Blakley, Bramhall, Burgess, Burns of Coos, Capron, Chamberlain, Colwell, Cooper, Craig, Dobbins, Fawk, Graham, Gray, Griffin, Henderson, Herman, Holcomb, Hudson, Huntley, Jagger, Jayne, Killingsworth, Laws, Linticum, Mayger, McLeod, Muir, Shook, Sitz, Sonnemann, Smith of Baker, Steiner, Von der Hellen, Welch, Mr. Speaker—37.

Kay took up the debate on the merits of the bill. If the local option bill was unjust and unfair, this Jayne bill was doubly so. He had not voted for the bill last spring, but he was now willing to line up with that class of people.

Did the members want their children to associate with those who represented the brewers and liquor dealers, or with the Young People's Christian association? He was sent for when nominated to see how he stood on moral questions, but had the courage and manhood to stand up for moral measures. He had made political enemies by his stand on this question, but he had acted in obedience to his conscience, and so he could look his family in the face.

Bingham of Lane said he would take Mr. Kay's advice, and would vote as his conscience would dictate and so he could face his wife and children.

West of Tillamook said the law would not be constitutional, and Hudson of Multnomah moved the previous question.

On passage of the bill the vote stood: Ayes 34, noes 15, absent 1. So the bill passed.
