THE PIRA OF THE PIRATES.
(Oregonian editorial.)

Had Governor L. Follette made the same remark a few years ago which he made at Galesburg the other day, he would have been numbered thenceforth among incendiary anarchists. "I should like," said the governor, "to have a hand in hanging Stuyvesant Fish." The action does not shudder; it merely wonders why Mr. La Follette should limit his sanguinary impulse to Stuyvesant Fish out of the great multitude who are ripe for the halter. Indeed, a very audible sigh of regret ascends from the American people that the belligerent reformer cannot proceed from the wish to its fulfillment. Nevertheless Stuyvesant Fish is a great man and Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish is something more than a great lady. He is president of the Illinois Central railroad and she has declined to be the wife of the president of the United States. To be sure, she declined without being asked, but it is the feeling of the heart, we must remember, that counts, not the external circumstances.

Later, and at a Chautauqua assembly, too, where incendiary utterances must fall upon the timidly correct congregations, one would suppose, like a band of pirates upon a nunnery, Mr. La Follette violently denounced that pillar of the church, the college and society, John D. Rockefeller. It is added in the account that what he said was applauded. Trifling in themselves, such facts as these are far from trivial when they must be taken as symptoms of a profound ethical revolution in the nation. They are the surface waves which tell something of a deep disturbance in the ocean of society. It is not unlikely that the American people are feeling just now the initial stirrings of a tremendous revival. Not a revival of ecclesiasticism, or of any kind of fetich worship, but of vital and efficient righteousness. That this is coming there are many signs. The enduring popularity of President Roosevelt, who is a righteous man in the sense of Matthew Arnold and the Hebrew prophets, is one sign. It is another, most ominous for evildoers in high places, that the wrath of the people against them does not burn itself out. The public does not weary of the continuous flood of exposure and denunciation in the newspapers. As people waken to the meaning of it, they are fascinated and enraged. They are stricken with the wholesome, old-fashioned convictions of sin, not in the grafters only, but in themselves. A whole nation is crying, "Lord, be merciful unto us miserable sinners." The belief is coming home to all of us that if Diogenes were to set out with his candle today to find an honest man, he would be still less successful than he was in Athens 2000 years ago. The nation sickens of its moral filth.

How will it fare with pillars of society like Fish and Rockefeller in that day of wrath which seems to be at hand? No sane person looks for a bloody, and, possibly, richly deserved, retribution upon these men; but there is going to be a fearful coming to judgment of some sort. What can they say in their defense? They can say, for one thing, that they are symptoms, rather than causes, of the national disease. Rockefeller can successfully plead in reply to Miss Tarbell, for example who indicts him again in the August McClure's, that he has not made the nation dishonest; but, rather, that the dishonesty of the nation gave him his opportunity to achieve his bad eminence in piracy. He was born into corruption, and, like the larvae of certain insects, he found it uniquely adapted to his nature, and threw in it. Not one of his schemes could have been manned or executed in a community with sound moral ideals. All of them must have failed in a country where adequate laws were faithfully enforced. Mr. Rockefeller found the law neither adequate to cover the conditions of modern commerce, nor enforced when its antiquated rules did apply. For every principle of law he found a method of evasion with as good, or better, standing in the courts. He has used the law as an apparatus for plunder; but he found law and lawyers ready to his hand. He created neither of them. Nor has he ever failed to find plenty of helpers in all his predatory undertakings.

With the soul of a miser and the intellect of a Bacon, Mr. Rockefeller was born at a time when lax morals and inadequate laws invited avarice to plunder. He accepted the invitation with determined zeal, and for many years he spent all his energy in devouring his abundant and easy prey. A student of the evolution of Mr. Rockefeller would naturally call this the larva or grub, period of his life. The student would also expect to see him emerge from this lowly estate, as the grubs do, and soar above the earth as a winged creature. Mr. Rockefeller, and all his genus, try very hard to complete their evolution and show themselves as something of a finer nature than mere devourers. No one enjoys the hatred of his kind. In these men the hunger for approbation even overcomes their avarice, and, without forsaking their evil ways, they pay enormous sums to buy the praise, or, at least, the silence, of those who lead public opinion. They find both the praise and silence for sale, but they find also that in this matter public opinion will not be led. It moves more and more strongly toward condemnation and begins to repudiate the leaders who would, as he thinks, mislead. These criminals, who have so long defied the law and despised the rules of many fair dealing, and who now wish to pose as philanthropists and benefactors of humanity, hear nothing from the great public but sneers and satire. They may ultimately hear something worse, for the American people are growing impatient of hypocrisy. But, whatever may befall, they are entitled to plead that the nation which now condemns them tempted them to commit their misdeeds by its own inadequate laws, pliant judiciary and lax morals.

Wants to Build at Once.
Editor Journal:—Since the recent election on the establishment of permanent bridges, it has been learned that many of the gentlemen who opposed the issue of bonds would favor such a movement for the building of one bridge as an experiment. It is therefore suggested that such a step might be taken either by the taxpayers' league or by the city council. Everybody admits that there are several bridges in our city which should be rebuilt. Consequently it seems only reasonable that a move should be made to this end. Many members of the Taxpayers' League who opposed bonding for six bridges believe the way to go at it would be to first take one and demonstrate what could be done in the way of quality, price and practicability. Let plans be made for a bridge, such as will be required in the location where a new structure is most needed at present. Let bids be received from different bridge builders, and surety given as to the price of construction, then when the matter is fully determined as to what kind of a bridge is wanted let it again be put to a vote of the people. In the meantime let a campaign be waged by everybody in the interest of better bridges.

Yours for permanency,
STEELE-CONCRETE.
