About Senators.

The relative honor of a seat in the United States senate and a state governorship is interestingly compared in July Collier's, as follows:

"Governor La Follette's willingness to go to Washington just after he had acquired control of Wisconsin has caused surprise. At one time such a choice would have been unheard of. Formerly the senate was often a step to the governorship, never the converse, but the subsidizing of state rights and the increase of central power have lessened the once proud post of governor and given vastly greater importance to an office which used to be held mainly for the purpose of expressing in congress the wishes of a state legislature. Speaking of this change at the commencement of the University of North Carolina, Congressman Boutell recalls a number of interesting examples. Harrison Gray Otis and John Davis of Massachusetts, Robert Y. Hayne of South Carolina, William L. Marey and Martin Van Buren of New York, Alexander Mouton of Louisiana, and a number of other well known men left the senate for the governorship. In 1851 Jefferson Davis and Henry Stuart Foote both resigned from the senate to canvass Mississippi as candidates for the governorship. In 1844 N. P. Tallmadge of New York gave up his seat in the United States senate for the Empire state to accept from President Tyler the governorship of the territory of Wisconsin. "If you wish," says Mr. Boutell, "to realize fully the extent of this change that we have been considering try to picture to yourselves the spectacle of a senator from New York at the present day resigning his seat in the most powerful legislative chamber in the world to become governor of Alaska or Oklahoma." During the last forty years no senator of the United States has resigned to become a governor. This year Tennessee as well as Wisconsin has seen her governor seek the greater prize.

If our senate is becoming less what it used to be, a collection of men who represented the wishes of the state legislatures, it approaches more in power and function, if not in distinction, to the senate which was the pride of ancient Rome. With the purification of our politics, now proceeding slowly, the senate may keep its power and increase the moral quality of its members.
