It appears now from the story of the township official that DeLauro, on the night of the murder, was secreted in the bouse of a countryman. At break of day be was taken to the sand hills of West Park, and literally buried in deep gully at the side of a hill, Here ned for a week, being provided with provisions and water. On the seventh day after the murder DeLauro was placed in an empty beer barrel and driven aboard the steamship Mary E. Patton, of the Pleasure Bay line.

When the steamer reached the pier in New York, the barrel, with its human freight, was driven to the dock of an outgoing Italian steamer for Naples. There it was carefully lowered into the hold, and, as the lights of Sandy Hook grew dim, the suspected murderer was released from his hiding place, and, with his companions, was granted freedom and a rousing welcome by his rescuerers. He is now, it is said, living peacefully in Italy, undisturbed by fear of the law, and safely concealed from detection. Whether De-Lauro will ever pay the penalty for the murder of Rosso depends upon how anxtous the Monmouth county authorities are to bring him to justice.
