Our Mothers.

Allow me, Mr. Editor, to present to you Wordsworth's picture of your mother, my mother, a true, a pure and perfect woman—the mother of our race. A countenance in which does meet sweet records, promises as sweet; creature not too bright or good for human nature's daily food, transient sorrows, simple wiles, false, blame, love, kisses, tears and smiles. Being breathing thoughtful breath, traveler between life and death; the reason firm, a temperate will, endurance, foresight, strength and skill. Perfect woman nobly planned, to warn, to comfort and command; and yet a spirit still and bright with something of an angel light. A light in the home, its glory, its beauty, its guiding star. Don't call on me to make laws. Do your voting, your law-making, and in all things as our lawfully protect our mothers, our mothers and daughters in the spheres where they shine, where they help, and where Nature, in her wisdom, expects them to be found.

Living "High" in Washington.

Residents of Washington frequently complain that the cost of living at the national capital is rapidly on the increase. Foreigners claim that Washington is a close second to St. Petersburg in point of expense. Both statements are probably an exaggeration, but an instance quoted by a diplomat the other day in support of this contention shows the attitude of some American laborers toward the government. This ambassador sent for a carpenter, whom he asked to quote prices on a walnut bookcase which he wished built in his study. The carpenter, after taking the measurements and doing a bit of figuring, said: "I can build that bookcase for you, perhaps, for $26, but if it is for the government I shall have to charge you $10 more."

When the ambassador asked the reason for this remarkable discrimination, the carpenter said: "We reason this way: The British government can just as easily afford to pay $36 for that bookcase as not, but $26 is enough to charge you for it. If your going to pay for it the price is $26."

"Then I'll pay for it," remarked the ambassador, quietly, and the deal was closed.—Boston Transcript.

FOR WAYS THAT ARE DARK

And Tricks not in Vain the Prohibitions are Peculiar and Successful

Sacramento, June 6.—State Superintendent Tenor, of the Anti-Saloon League, went to Ione today for the purpose of arresting five saloon keepers, charged with violating the law by selling liquor within two miles of a state reformatory or penal institution, namely the Preston School of Industry. The law was passed at the last session of the legislature, at the instigation of the temperance people, and if it is upheld will close five saloons at Ione and 19 at Folsom, near the penitentiary.

Making Home Attractive.

The man in the faded brown overcoat had been growing more and more careworn for the last six months. The man who sat with him on the way to the city every morning and on the way home at night noticed it. At last he learned the reason of the change. The careworn man dropped into his seat with such a heavy sigh one evening that it would have been impossible for his friend not to hear it.

"I guess you're glad you're going home, where you can get a good comfortable chair and have a quiet evening," he said.

"Quiet evening!" echoed the careworn man. "We don't have any quiet evenings nowadays."

"Don't you?" asked his friend, uncomfortably. "Why—er—"

"There's no domestic trouble," said the sufferer, dolefully. "There's nothing I'm ashamed to speak of. It's only that my wife has been reading a series of articles on 'How to Make Home Attractive,' and she's carrying out all the ideas—with me to help her."

"You needn't think of me sitting in an armchair before the fire, with my feet up, now I can tell you. You can picture me stringing dry peapods to make a handsome hanging, or covering an old apple barrel with wool wadding ready for the pink muslin that's going to turn it into a charming mirror stand. If it isn't that, I shall be engaged in giving a hardwood finish to some of the floors with a preparation that I saw my wife mixing in a tin pail this morning. "Our home may be attractive, if we ever get it done and I'm allusive to appreciate it, but I'll wage the woman that writes those articles lives in a hotel or boards in a bad bedroom," and the careworn man gave another heavy sigh as the brakeman called out "Paradise Center!" and he gathered up his bundles.—Youth's Companion.

How to Raise Goslings.

After the goslings leave the nest let the remain with the mother goose two or three days, but feed them. When they appear to be strong enough to take care of themselves, separate them from the mother goose, letting them run in a pen where there is grass. They should be prevented from wandering away. At night they should be put in a box and covered up, so they will keep warm, but they must have some air or they will smother. They should never be allowed to get wet with dew or rain; therefore they should be turned out late in the morning, and after they are strong enough they may be allowed to run at large. Give them plenty of water and feed them morning and night with cornbread cooked as you would for your own eating, but it will be better if made very greasy with some cayenne pepper added to produce heat. If properly attended to as above stated they will be easily raised, and will get very fat. The greases in the bread will kill the poison in the vegetation they eat, and onions and lettuce are also fine feed for them. I had thirty-six, and they began to die, one or two a day, until I lost ten, and I began to care for them as I have here stated, and none of them have died since then. I send this for publication for the benefit of those who raise geese. —B. L. White.

OREGON VOLCANOES

Pacific Coast is Encircled by Craters; Chain Extends Entire Length of Pacific Coast, Across Behring Sea to Asia and Thence to Formosa, Philippines, New Zealand and Hawaii; Oregon Has Seven Extinct Volcanoes.

J. M. Scanlan writes the following intensely interesting article on the extinct volcanoes of the Pacific coast region for the San Francisco Chronicle.

The review of Oregon and Washington mountain peaks is especially interesting and is worthy of finding a permanent place in the geological history of the coast. The article is as follows:

According to geologists there is a "sympathetic feeling" in the volcanic vents which surround the Pacific ocean as a chain of fire and extend through California and the northwest. This is demonstrated by the local disturbances which are occasionally felt at about the same time in the various sections.

This almost endless chain begins in far away Terra del Fuogo, appropriately, "The Land of Fire," and is extended along the west slope of South and Central America, where the belt is only about 30 miles wide. But when it reaches Mexico it broadens to nearly 800 miles. It touches the gulf coast and causes disturbance in that region. From Mexico the belt of fire extend northward to California, Oregon, Washington, and along the coast line of British Columbia. Thence it extends to Alaska, where there are large, active craters, and thence through the Aleutian islands, New Zealand and to the Hawaiian islands. The burning craters of frozen Alaska unite this chain of fire of the western world with the old world, including our newly acquired Philippines, Corea, Formosa and Japan.

In Alaska this belt of slumbering fire contracts to about 25 or 30 miles in width—the same as in South America. In California and throughout the northwest the belt again broadens to the width of about 800 or 900 miles—about the same width as in Mexico. The southern extremity of this molten belt line curves eastward and the northern extremity curves westward—thus forming the shape of the capital letter "S."

Oregon Volcanoes.

All of the mountains in the Cascade range in Oregon and in Washington have craters either at the summit or on the sides. There are seven in Oregon and five in Washington, ranging from 7000 to 14,000 feet in height. Mount Klamath, 8233 feet in height, is one of the most remarkable extinct volcanoes on this continent, and perhaps in the world. It is 35 miles north of Lake Klamath and, strangely, encompasses a lake. It is known as Crater lake, is about 2000 feet deep, and is surrounded by nearly vertical walls of about the same height above the surface of the lake, which gives the crater a depth of about 4000 feet. Geologists hold that an eruption in prehistoric times blew the mountain's head off, and that the melting of the glaciers caused the lake. Mount Rainier, the highest in the range, contains a bowl shaped crater almost of exact circular form. This mountain is said to be the grandest and most picturesque single peak in the known world. Lovers of mountain scenery say its picturesqueness consists not so much in its height as in its isolated position, and because it rises almost straight from the ocean level.

Mount Shasta, crowned with eternal snows, the mecca of tourists and writers, also lost its head in prehistoric ages, according to geologists. It is a typical volcanic formation and has a double cone. The second, known as "Shastina," or "Little Shasta," is about 2000 feet below the summit. The ambition of tourists is to climb to the summit of Shasta, or at least reach Little Shasta, to look into the vent which splits the mountain in twain.

One of the immense lava streams extended 50 miles down Sacramento canyon, where it cooled and stopped, as the traces of the flow indicate. This eruption, geologists say, is of very ancient date. Some geologists, however, do not believe that this eruption was of sufficient force to blow out the smaller vent, or Shastina. Three years ago Mount Hood became very active and threw out sulphuric fumes, much to the discomfort of the natives, especially to the noble red men on the reservations. This mountain also lost its head in prehistoric ages, and now remains only its original walls. It forms picturesque background to Portland, but the recent disturbance did no damage other than frightening the timid.

Mount St. Helens, which is 10,000 feet in height, has shown activity only once within the last half century. The pioneers, trappers and Indian braves took to the woods, believing that the end of the world was at hand, according to local chronicles of that time. It was stated that the light from the flow of molten lava was as light as day, and that one could easily see to read a newspaper. But it is not recorded in local print that any stopped to prove that it could be done.

Four Cases of Child Slavery.

Ether, the "Stogie" Maker.—It was long past midnight when I entered the foul smelling basement of the Pittsburg tenement, No. —, Blank street, where little Esther Silverstein sat by her mother's side helping her to make cheap "stogies." This little Jewish maiden was born in a Philadelphia tenement less than eleven years ago. Her father died of tuberculosis, and the painful cough of the mother as she works tells all too plainly that little Esther will sooner or later be completely orphaned. There are four younger children, which explains why little Esther must go to school by day and then work ten or twelve hours at a stretch. How long will she be able to do it?

The Tiny Flower Makers.

At No. 144 Sullivan street, on the lower West Side of New York, in an Irish-Italian slum, lives the Dennis family. Mary, the oldest girl, is 15, but she has not gone to school long enough in her life to get her working papers. Angelina is 11, and there are three younger boys. They all work on artificial flowers, toiling from very early in the morning until late at night, for the home manufacture of cheap flowers is one of the badly paid employments. Sometimes, when they are very hungry, Mary gets a job in Grusset's cany factory, in Prince street, near Broadway. She was working there during the last slack season in flowers.

May, "Fourteen" Years Old.—In Syracuse, New York, during the stress of the last canning season, I watched little May Mills at her work. When it was over, at half past ten o'clock at night, I spoke to her and learned that she had worked from seven o'clock that morning. Asked how old she was, she answered glibly, "I'm 14, sir." But when I asked her to tell me her "real age" instead of her "make-believe" age, she answered, "Eight last Friday, sir." Little May, who is an American child, born of American born parents, had never been to school in her life. "Sept's kindergarten," she said. She is living in a land of liberty.
