HAAKON IS FITTED WITH A NEW LID

Took Two Weeks and Representatives From all the Royal Houses to Get it Set on Straight, and Made to Fit

Trondhjem, Norway, June 22.—The festivities, which began here with the arrival of King Haakon VII. and Queen Maud, on Tuesday, reached their most brilliant culmination today in the crowning of the king in the ancient cathedral, which has seen the coronation of a long line of rulers of Sweden and Norway. Trondhjem was founded in the Tenth century, but it is not a very large city according to American standards; it has a population of only 40,000 and it may be imagined that the sudden influx of the many thousands of visitors attracted by the coronation from all parts of the world, severely taxed the ability of the city to accommodate the visitors. For nearly a week every hotel and tavern was crowded to its full capacity and hundreds of private citizens found it profitable to open their houses to the visitors who were unable to find accommodations in the public hostels.

Trondhjem is an old city and has preserved a great deal of its natural beauty and mediaeval picturesqueness. The decorations, lavishly employed by the citizens, added greatly to the beauty of the old town and the general effect was indescribably beautiful and attractive. The new flag of Norway was everywhere in evidence and pictures of the king and queen were displayed in thousands of windows.

At sunrise this morning an artillery salute of 101 shots ushered in the day of the coronation. It was the signal for enthusiastic outbursts of patriotism in all parts of the city, as it announced the beginning of the day on which, after a long period of dependence, the first independent ruler of Norway was to be crowned. Soon the town bestirred itself. The crowds in the streets increased with every minute; troops began to march through the quiet streets of the town, accompanied by bands playing stirring march music.

The time of the coronation had been set for 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and as that time approached an enormous wave of humanity moved toward the center of the city, where the ancient cathedral is situated. The streets between the royal palace and the cathedral were kept clear by troops, which formed an impregnable cordon, behind which the thousands of spectators formed a solid mass of humanity. Every window and balcony and even some of the roofs were occupied by people who were anxiously awaiting the arrival of the royal procession.

Shortly before 10:30 o'clock the king and queen, attired in their magnificent coronation costumes, and accompanied by a brilliant train, started for the cathedral. The cortege included the members of the royal house, many foreign princes, representing the rulers of various European countries, the members of the cabinet, the officers of the royal household, representatives of the sortling, and of the municipalities of the principal cities of Norway.

The ancient cathedral presented a magnificent spectacle when the royal couple entered, while the crowds on the cathedral square cheered with unbounded enthusiasm. Pages in gorgeous uniforms carried the trains of the royal robes draped over the shoulders of the king and the queen. Heralds opened the cortege when it marched through the center aisle to the steps of the altar. They were followed by the master of ceremonies, carrying a long white staff. Then came gorgeously attired officers, carrying the crowns and other insignia of the kingdom, the royal scepter and sword, resting upon beautiful velvet cushions, embroidered with gold.

The cathedral was filled with a brilliant audience, including the diplomatic representatives of the various foreign governments, according to their rank, high dignitaries of the state, high officers representing the army and navy and the various branches of the government.

The coronation ceremony was highly impressive. It was performed by the Archbishop of Trondhjem, assisted by a number of prominent ministers and dignitaries of the church from different parts of the kingdom. At the exact moment when the crown was placed upon the head of the king a royal salute was fired by the artillery stationed on the cathedral square. The cheers of the people almost drowned the thunder of the guns. Immediately after the ceremony the choir, accompanied by the organ and an orchestra, sang the coronation hymn, which was composed by Odin Ransing, a Norwegian musician living in Milwaukee, Wis. After the conclusion of the ceremonies the king and the queen returned to the royal palace, greeted along the entire route by the enthusiastic cheers of the multitude. Flowers were thrown from the windows and balconies, and flags, hats and handkerchiefs frantically waved.

A grand state dinner at the palace followed, which was attended by 300 guests, among them the personal and diplomatic representatives of the foreign rulers and governments and high dignitaries of the various branches of the home government. Tonight there will be a torchlight procession and a gala performance at the royal theater. The rest of the week will be taken up with various festivities, including parades of children, civic organizations, military parades and receptions of deputations from all parts of the country by the king. On Monday there will be a brilliant soiree at the palace.

Among the thousands of visitors who came to Trondhjem to attend the coronation are many Norwegians who came from the United States for the purpose of witnessing the celebration. It is expected that the king will receive a delegation of the Norwegian Americans, including Odin Ransing, the author of the coronation hymn; the Rev. J. D. Bothne of Hitterdal, Minn., who has written a greeting to King Haakon entitled "Norway's King," and Alfred Paulsen of Chicago, who set the poem to music. A beautifully engrossed copy of the poem on parchment will be presented to the king. The poem is enclosed in an embossed leather art portfolio, showing the arms of Norway on the front, those of the United States on the back.

Trondhjem, Norway, June 22.—Haakon was crowned king of Norway today in the Trondhjem cathedral. He is the first ruler Norway has had to itself for nearly 600 years. Everything was impressive in its simplicity. The city was awakened this morning by the firing of salutes from all warships in the harbor. There were several showers. The principal delegations of eightaers were from America. The official delegation from Chicago was headed by Gade, Norwegian consul at Chicago. Fifteen hundred Americans were present. Eighty members of the European royal houses were present. Sweden sent no delegation. Passive objection was made to the coronation by Republicans and Social Democrats, who favor a republic. Order was maintained by 2000 soldiers. The procession to the church was simple, consisting of the king, queen, court officials and a small escort. From religious motives Haakon refused to follow the ancient custom of making the tour of the city afoot. The small party drove through packed streets, with an utter absence of pomp or luxury. Five carriages were in the procession. The envoys drove to the church separately. The bishops of Christiansia, Trondhjem and Bergen met them at the door and escorted them to the throne. During the coronation a march especially composed for the ceremony, took place, the dignitaries of the church officiating, the bishop of Trondhjem praying at its close for divine blessings upon the monarch and the people.

The ceremony lasted an hour. Bishop Haug preached a sermon, after which
