LIKE STOCK BROKERS

Gamblers Are Running Games in San Francisco on the Sidewalks

The fire destroyed every landmark, every picturesque alleyway, every bazaar, joss house, gambling hell and habitation in Chinatown. Nothing remains of the Oriental quarter but a succession of brick piles that look very much like the brick piles of any other section of the burned district, and a Chinatown guide would have trouble in determining just where, in the wilderness of debris, the former Chinese quarter lay, unless he measured his footsteps from the ruins of St. Mary's Church or the Hall of Justice. Yet notwithstanding the fact that Chinatown has been effaced from the map, gambling is going on in Chinatown openly and in defiance of law.

The Chinese, however, have no hand in the gambling now being conducted in their former quarters. Numerous contingents of "tinhorn" gamblers have picked up the industry where it was dropped by the Chinese and are pursuing their enterprises in the broad glare of the summer day on the sidewalks of Dupont street, apparently without fear of molestation and with astounding profit. Three gambling enterprises were running full blast yesterday afternoon and the fleeing of the unwary stranger who bit at the tempting bait was pursued with an avidity that was as laughable as it was pathetic.

"Get your money on, boys," shouted a tall fellow, with a reassuring and comforting smile, who was manipulating a pin game in the shadow of St. Mary's church.

"I'm on," said a capper, tossing a quarter on the checkered oilcloth that presented a curious arrangement of letters and numbers.

"So am I," declared another, parting with a quarter.

Five cappers, by actual count, were assisting the industry. They all declared themselves in and came up with the required ante. A stranger changed a gold piece and deposited a quarter with the gamekeeper. Then some one knocked down the pins. The pins were very much like miniature temples, with flat sides. Each side bore a number.

"Two, eight, thirteen, seventeen, twenty, thirty-seven," announced the gamekeeper, going through the motions of adding up the figures on the upper faces of the pins. "Look for thirty-seven on the cloth. Here it is—37 J. P. That's a jackpot. That costs me $5, but it only costs each one of you $1."

"I'm in," declared one of the cappers quickly, tossing in a dollar.

Everybody came up with the required contribution, and the pins were knocked down again.

"Forty-two," announced the gamekeeper. "Look for forty-two. Here it is—42 D. U. That means double up. That's bad for me. It costs me $10, but it only costs each of you gentlemen $2. Now, no one can get in who wasn't in before."

"We've got him going," declared a capper, enthusiastically.

Everybody sweetened the pot with the required $2.

And so it continued, until, by a most amazing turn of ill-fortune, the house captured the entire pot.

Sometimes there were no strangers in the play. Then the cappers won amazingly. It was really pathetic to see how much money the gamekeepering down of the pins netted the cappers when an outsider did not figure in the calculation. Under such circumstances a 25-cent ante and one knocking down of the pins netted the cappers from $5 to $15 each. Such easy money was too great a temptation for the unwary and susceptible stranger who was poking around the ruins of Chinatown for relics of the fire and the following play usually found one or more victims.

Further along Dupont street was another device designed to separate the stranger from his money with the least possible fuss and protest. It consisted of a revolving pointer or indicator that swung around on a needle and finally came to rest between two pins, the space between the pins being numbered and lettered to determine the fortune of the players. The same scheme of jackpots and doubling up bets provided in this game as in the pin game, and all operated to extract as much money from the victim as his purse would stand.

GOLDEN NUGGETS FOR SALLOW PEOPLE

Further along the street a third separation device was running, and like the other two, it received generous patronage from Sunday night-cappers, who were led to take a flier at the game. It proved a prosperous day for this tin-horn gentry, who numbered, cappers and all, something like a score. The games were run openly on the sidewalks of Dupont street, apparently without fear of police interference.
