City Officials Go Nose Gathering to Find What is Troubling Stockton

Stockton, Cal., July 20.—All Stockton officials went "odor" hunting today. For the past two weeks every wind has carried a vile stench over the city, creating fears of a pestilence. It is said hundreds of dead pigs and cattle, drowned by the flood, putrifying on the levees of the island district. The odor became unbearable, and the officials were overwhelmed with complaints, and so decided to trace the odor to its source. They chartered a launch today and left to cruise the flooded district.
