Related news articles on the San Francisco earthquake repeat the stirring newspaper stories about the brilliant spirit in which the people of the city met disaster. This is undeniable, and nobody can wish to deny it. It was a high example of American fortitude and courage. If there were shown at first only in word and thought, the immediate exigencies left no occasion for acts of self-help. Everybody was too busy helping others.

But with the passing of the immediate crisis of danger and destitution, comes a time when the gallant spirit of San Francisco can be shown best by self-reliance and resourcefulness of the human heritage of toil even by those not accustomed to it before. The city is to be rebuilt.

This cannot be done by honest and prudent administration of relief funds, by municipal agitation for government loans, by political organizations of workmen to control industry, by clamoring for free food and making speeches in vacant lots about the rights of the people. It can be done only by putting every hand to the wheel of labor. The country has been taught by stories of the gallant spirit of San Francisco to expect to see every able-bodied man grasp pick or shovel, hammer or trowel, to support his family by rebuilding the city.

At this distance it cannot be known with certainty how far this expectation is realized. But disquieting reports come from time to time. In spite of high wages offered there seems to be a labor famine in San Francisco. The railroads are sending out circulars inviting both skilled and unskilled labor to the city. The relief authorities would not permit this unless there were real need. But it is hard to reconcile need with the daily feeding of thousands. Can there be many families without an able-bodied member to work?

There are tales of more than idleness and unthrift in the labor force. The political agitators of the labor unions are accused of taking advantage of the situation to make unreasonable demands and the past reputation of the city makes the report credible. There is most need of men in the structural iron trade, which is a chronic sufferer from labor troubles. If San Francisco is presenting the spectacle of a labor strike and huge soup kitchens side by side, it is no wonder that the news of it is not sent out freely.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Twenty Four Elephants, and Some Regular Monkey
 and Baboon Clowns

The menagerie department of the Forepaugh-Sells circus, which comes here Wednesday next enjoys, in addition to its entertaining features, a wealth of fun and humor. The monkey cage holds a fascination for many. There is a Siamese monkey in a cage with several others, who, for some reason, will have nothing to do with him. This ostracism exasperated the Siamese and whenever he got a chance he would grab one of the other by the tail, drag him all over the high perches and drop his victim with a dull thud.

Mr. Patterson, who has charge of the zoological department, is the owner of a fine watch dog which is on friendly terms with many of the animals. Mr. Patterson has another pet, a large "Spider" monkey so tame that he is allowed the freedom of the menagerie, except at exhibition hours. "Zulu" the monkey, takes great delight in teasing the dog. As soon as the dog settles himself for a doze the monkey will steal up and give the canine's tail a vicious tug. Of course, the dog will go for her, but she will simply wait till he gets close enough, then leap over his head and from behind give his tail another pull.

There is a monkey of the baboon species, that at times will take hold of the dish in which her food is served and put in on her head, as if it were a hat. Thus adorned, she provokes roars of laughter, to her evident gratification, from the crowd around her cage. There is another baboon in Mr. Patterson's collection which "got good and even" with one of the care-takers who had a penchant for teasing the baboon. Seeing the care-taker approaching, the baboon poured some water into a hole in the ground, mixing it with earth so as to make mud. When his enemy came up he splashed the muddy water on the care-taker's uniform. For a long time after this every time the animal saw the care-taker he indulged in what had every appearance of being laughter.

The elephants have a decided sense of humor, or signs of one any way, and many are the amusing capers they indulge in between exhibition hours. They are 24 of these amooth pachyderms with the Forepaugh-Sells collection, two of which are said to be the rarest and most costly in the world, the only two of their species known to be in captivity. They have huge, umbrella shaped ears which cover nearly the half of their bodies. One of them is deeply attached to "Boston" the baby elephant of the group, and is never quiet when "Boston" is out of her sight.

The zoological department of the combined Adam Forepaugh-Sells Brothers menageries is, it is said, the largest collection of rare wild animals in the world.

 REALLY
 PATHETIC

We often wonder if eastern Oregon has any interests, part or claim in or to the great state of Oregon. The government recognizes it as an arid waste that does not amount to anything unless they can use it for political purposes, the Willamette valley recognizes it as the proper prey for its own schemes, and now the United States district court states that in the land frauds it is not to be considered except as to send its leading men to the penitentiary. A jury of our peers have been selected consisting of 120 and we scanned them close for an eastern Oregon man. We must advertise. Eastern Oregon men wanted. There are surely none in Oregon or why do we get the cold shoulder all the time.—Vale Brain.

Only Heavy Rains Will Prevent Them Crossing the Main Cascade Range

Sunday's Albany Herald says: J. M. Sears of Dallas and A. L. Porter of Norton's arrived in the city last night from Quartzville where they surveyed a township of unsurveyed timber lands for the government, spending the past six weeks at the work. They report the forest fires southeast of Detroit still raging and Mr. Sears, who has spent the greater part of his life in the mountains and woods, expressed the conviction that the fires would cross the Cascade mountains to the eastern edge of the reserve before they would burn themselves out. The green timber is burning he asserts and the damage being done is enormous. Yesterday morning at Gates, the smoke pall was so thick that the sun at 7 a. m., appeared as a great blood-red ball, and on the trail coming into Gates on their way out of the mountains the smoke was stifling. The worst fire is on the Linn county side of the Santiam river and is spreading in every direction according to these gentlemen, and nothing short of a heavy rain will stop the flames.

Reports from Detroit last evening were to the effect that near that place the fires had gone down and that the men from the sawmills who had been in the mountains fighting the fires, had returned to their work. The fire this side of Berry is still burning but at that point is doing little if any damage.

Reports from the Portland camping parties are to the effect that they are all in good shape and in no danger from the fires and that all of them will conclude their outings as originally decided upon.

Sockless Swimmers.
 (Astorian.)

Alas! poor woman! She cannot escape the demands of fashion even at the bathing beaches. No matter to what least common multiple she has reduced her bathing suit, she is still open to the cynosure and strictures of the prudish in chairs and on the observation stands. As she finds her way to the surf among the mass of tanned arms and legs that bestrew the beach and appertain to her brothers, her cousins and their male associates, the summer girl has long been impressed with the superior wisdom of the male variety of bather in giving his legs the same freedom as his arms. He wear no long stockings soaked full of the sea, to impede his swimming and hangs as a head weight from his body, therefore why should she? So, a few days ago, the summer girl at Ocean Park, in a moment of high resolve and low hose, appeared on the sands in socks. The shock nearly killed sister, but the innovation is likely to remain, it is said, until sister recovers and then,—well, then the summer girl is expected to shed even socks, and sister will depart early to the mountains, with a chaperone and her smelling salts.

PROFITS OF GREAT CORPORATION

No better evidence of business activity could be found than the last quarterly statement of the United States Steel corporation. During the three months ending June, net earnings were over $40,000,000, or two and a half millions greater than any other quarter. During the six months ending June the net profits were $76,750,000, promising to surpass the best previous half-year record; hence the dividend upon the common stock. So far as can be seen, the steel management appears to be amply justified in their confidence in the future. The year 1906 is certain to be the most prosperous in its existence, and hopeful expectations are now indulged in for 1907. Fortunately the business has been managed on a strictly conservative basis, and these profits were made in a period when prices were much lower and more reasonable than during the previous boom. Thus far this great corporation, which has been under prolonged criticism and controls about 50 or 60 per cent of the country's product, has been a steady influence in the iron market, and if its present policy is continued, should gradually establish itself in public confidence. The demand for steel products is constantly widening, and American railroads are certain to be very large purchasers during the next twelve months in order to satisfy the requirements of new construction and extensive contemplated improvements. Our steel trade, however, it should not be forgotten, is subject to violent fluctuations. Railroad and structural work are still the chief avenues of consumption, and any abatement in activity in these quarters would be sharply felt in the demand for steel. It is only about three years ago that the company failed to entirely earn its preferred dividend.—Weekly Financial Review.
