EUGENE IMPORTS A "JAG"

The Local Papers Modestly Refrain From Being Puffed Up About It

The Eugene Guard Friday tells of a man being found dead drunk on the northbound passenger, as it stopped in that thriving city. The Guard also says that the D.D. was taken from the train loaded into a hack (dispite the fact that he was already loaded) and taken to the jail. Here the story ends, so far at least as the Guard is concerned. To the outside world—that is the world outside of Eugene, the story has a pathetic as well as an amusing side. It shows to what straits our neighbor is reduced, when it has to import a drunken man from Roseburg, to maintain the reputation for hospitality of its city lockup. Just why Eugene wanted to keep him is a mystery. In most of the valley towns a cold hearted city recorder tells all such to move on. It exports them, and the city jail is cold, gloomy and inhospitable. They are introduced to the rock pile, and treated with ignominious contumely. Not so with Eugene! It extended to their weary Willie its hospitable arms, impressed a delivery wagon, and escorted him with all the pomp and panoply permissible in civic life, to the city building, the city's one, lone, and yet most distinguished guest. The Guard with becoming modesty refrains from elaborating on the event; or giving the program in detail. It is rumored, however, that when the glad tidings circled round that there was a real old fashion booze-fighter loaded to the guards, (not the papers) with the genuine old-time coffin varnish, holding down a cot in the city bastille that there was a regular hegra in that direction. Those who had suffered from aridity of the thorax for many weary moons hung hopefully around the jail corridors, waiting for the gentleman to recover sufficiently from the Roseburg jag to show himself. They came by ones and twos up the side streets and down the back alleys—some even boldly tackling the main thoroughfares, all moved by one grand patriotic purpose, to look once again upon a jag of full grown proportions and artistic creation; a masterpiece, from the great world outside of Eugene, the edge of which reached as near to it as Roseburg.

Never since Roderick Dhu has there been a more "spirited" gathering of the clans—and like the followers of that immortal chieftian—they forgot everything else at the call.

But, alas; jags are of the earth earthy. Eugene could keep the man but the jag is beyond the reach of man or law. The man who carried it could be kept but in the course of a few hours the jag had flown, leaving behind to all except its owner a tender recollection, and a sadness born of re-awakened memories.

IN JUDGE FULLERTON'S TIME

An Incident of Circuit Court, Wherein Ben Hayden Was Equal to the Emergency.

Judge McFadden tells it himself, and with keenest appreciation of the wit in the incident, though the joke was on himself. It was in the case in the Summit shooting scrape years ago, wherein a man named McCaleb was involved, and McVeigh was a witness. Judge McFadden was conducting the examination on one side and Ben Hayden on the other. The Corvallis lawyer was endeavoring to destroy the testimony of McVeigh and with considerable success, as usual.

"Isn't it a fact," he asked of McVeigh, "isn't it a fact that your brother served a term of three years in the penitentiary?"

"Yes," the witness was forced to reply.

"That's all," said the judge with a significant tone of voice and a significant look at the jury.

By and by it came Mr. Hayden's time to refer to the incident, and the foxy old lawyer was equal to the occasion. "Now, this man McFadden has referred to the fact that a brother of McVeigh has been in the penitentiary," he said. "I say this man McFadden is trying to prejudice this jury, to prejudice this jury, I say, against Mr. McVeigh. Like an honest man that he is, I say, Mr. McVeigh admits that his brother did spend three years in the penitentiary. Like the honest man that he is, I say, he admits this, but there is one question that the man McFadden did not ask. He did not ask, I say, this man McFadden did not ask the witness who defended his brother, and it is well he didn't, gentlemen of the jury, I say it is well that he didn't, for it was this man McFadden that defended the brother of witness, and with a lawyer like that, I say, with a lawyer like that, what else could I say, what else could he do but go to the penitentiary."—Corvallis Times.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Golden left this morning for Portland, to be with the latter's sister, Miss Leona Penland, who will undergo a serious operation at the hospital today.

SPARE THAT HOME

The Old House of Dr. McLoughlin at Oregon City Being Remodeled

The old home of Dr. McLoughlin at the head of Main street, opposite the woolen mills, is being remodeled into a more convenient and modern house. Parts of the house that were brought from England are being taken out and replaced with new parts. How this is regarded by strangers was shown Thursday, when Dr. and Mrs. Wm. S. Wallace, of Los Angeles, visited the old home during a tour to points of historic interest about our city. "Nothing less than sacrilege," said Mrs. Wallace, "and I am surprised that the citizens here do not take steps to preserve their historic places both as a matter of duty and pride, and for financial reasons as well, for I am sure such places attract many visitors to your city."

Dr. and Mrs. Wallace themselves came to Oregon City because of its historic interest. They had read Mrs. Eva Emery Dye's book "McLoughlin and Old Oregon;" being at Portland came to this city to meet the author of the book that had given them so much pleasure, and to see the places where the great McLoughlin lived and worked.

Under Mrs. Dye's guidance they saw the graves of Dr. Loughlin and his wife. The great pioneer of this Pacific northwest, founder of Burlington, Iowa, as well as our own city, was buried in St. John's churchyard in 1857, and three years later his Indian wife was laid beside him. His stone bears this inscription: "A friend of Oregon and founder of Oregon City."

In the church a stained glass window dedicated to his memory gives a speaking likeness of Dr. McLoughlin. The old home is fully described in Mrs. Dye's book. The front room on the left on the large hall is where the old man died. It still contains the old-fashioned fire-place. Across the hall was his wife's sitting room. The narrow "colonial" windows on each side of the front door came from England when the house was built. It is a two story frame building with broad steps from the street to the door.—Oregon City Star.

Some Salmon.

Saturday was the banner day of the present fishing season on the lower river. Over 7000 fish were received the next morning at the cannery in Bandon, not to mention nearly as much delivered at the Prosper concern at the same time. Holman & Patterson caught 1000 at one haul Saturday, but the greatest haul so far for this year was by Erickson Bros., who ensnared between 1500 and 1700 of the finnies into their seine at one swoop. A picture was taken of Ott Willard, his crew and their floating palace, the Antelope, together with two scows weighted with salmon, as the fleet came to anchor in sight of Bandon Sunday morning. The picture was a good one, but the camera succumbed to the awful bombardment.—Bandon Recorder.
