ROBERTS A MORMON STILL

That He Believes in Polygamy, Always Did and Always Will

A sensational feature of the controversy which has been waged between the preachers of the Evangelical church and the Mormon Priesthood was the address delivered in the tabernacle at Salt Lake Wednesday by Elder Brigham H. Roberts, who was excluded from congress because of his polygamous practices. He spoke in reply to an open letter published by the ministerial association. Elder Roberts frankly declared that the church had surrendered not one iota of the belief in the principle of polygamy, but countenanced no polygamous marriages while they were forbidden by law. Of himself he said:

"I stand exactly where I did 10 years ago, namely, that though the church proclaimed against the continuation of this relationship, though the state proclaimed against it, neither the church nor the state may dissolve the moral obligations I am under, or release me from that moral duty."

Mr. Roberts characterized the Evangelical ministers as belonging to a third sex, neither male nor female, and said they were better qualified for pink teas than state-manship. All of the high officials of the church, including President Smith, were present and tacitly inquired the address of Mr. Roberts as an utterance of the church body.

"How much postage will this require?" asked the young author. "It is one of my manuscripts." "Two cents an ounce," answered the postoffice clerk. "That's first-class matter."

SALEM'S FRUIT CANNERY

Pretty Girls Prepare Tons of Small Fruit for Far Away People

To most of the Journal's readers the mention of the Salem Cannery Company would convey the idea of a big building some place, where fruit was put up in cans, boxed and shipped away. Well, in a sense that is what it is, but it is also much more, that to be understood and appreciated must be seen.

Thursday afternoon a Journal reporter strolled down that way, and seeing a sign "Visitors must procure a ticket at the office," immediately became possessed of a desire to go through the institution, without getting a ticket, of course, for the notice looked like a dare, and no newspaper man worth the name will shy at a dare. The means used does not matter, but that the scheme worked is evidenced by this story.

The reporter went in where the other good things go in, dodging between wagons that waited in a long line to dump their loads of fruit, and then he sat up and began to take notice.

At the door three or four young fellows were emptying strawberries from the small, pound boxes, into lows whisked away, as fast as they laws whisked away, as fast as they were filled. The reporter's curiosity was aroused and he concluded to follow the berries. This took him back into a big room where 150 girls, each brighter-eyed and more rosy fingered than the others, were doing all sorts of things to the big crimson fruit. Its a sure thing that a strawberry has no idea what is coming to it when it enters the cannery doors, but it soon finds out.

The color scheme of the big room is red. Long tables are arranged cross ways of the room, suspended from the ceiling joists, for convenience. By this arrangement there are no legs under the table except those belonging to—but that is another story, anyway they are in nobody's way. It adds much, however, to the convenience of the workers—and also makes the scrubbing of the floor, a nightly occurrence, much easier. Around these tables the nimble-fingered girls are busy as bees in a clover patch, hulling, grading, sorting and chattering, just a little bit; for the work is paid for by the piece, and the less chatter and more berries, the more money—and that's what the girls are there for.

When a box is full it is taken to the weigher, and proper credit given. Then to the fillers, another bevy of girls, who deftly fill the cans and forward them to the strapping machine, where in a jiffy the proper amount of sweetness is added to a dozen or two cans at a time by simply pulling a lever, then they slide down to the soldering machine where they get out of sight of the girls and are turned over to the men. From the soldering machine an endless chain apron carries them gently down an inclined plane and here for the first time in their brief lives they get into hot water. A small vent has been left open in the middle of the lids of the cans, and this hot bath serves to drive out the air, and they are in a few minutes again on a table where the vent is stopped and they are conveyed into the boilers where they are cooked from a dozen to twenty minutes. Then they are given a cold bath and stacked up, still in trays, to get perfectly cool. After this they are taken into the big ware house and stacked up to await labeling and boxing. The labeling is not done until they are sold and ready to be shipped, as cans occasionally spring a leak, thus spoiling the labels. A spur from the railroad runs along the side of the warehouse, and numerous doors making the loading of cars an easy task. And then the big Marion county strawberry leaves its native heath to give joy and comfort to some husky miner in Alaska or gladden the palate of some other fellow down in the sage brush—who gets both his berries and the cream to go with them out of a can.

With other fruits the treatment varies somewhat, but is practically the same. The greater part of the work of preparing all fruits for canning must be done by hand. Cherries and prunes are graded as to size by machinery, but that is about the extent of machine work.

The recent rains have caused the quantity of berries delivered to fall off somewhat, but Wednesday about six tons were handled. Six tons of crimson lusciousness with yellow epaulets on it—six tons of scarlet sweetness flecked with gold! Wouldn't it be a satisfaction to turn your best girl loose at that pile with a tank car full of cream and a tea spoon?

Wednesday about seven thousand quart cans of berries and cherries were put up. These cans when ready for shipment are packed two dozen in a case, and Wednesday's pack would make about 300 cases. These cases are, in round numbers, 18x14x10 inches, and the 300 would make 440 cubic feet, or a pile ten feet square and four feet high.

Then the Salem side of it is good to contemplate. There is the pay roll, running according to the season, from $2500 to $5000 a month, and this not counting salaries, but only the cash passed out in wages, most of it to girls, who are happier from having employment and certainly more self-reliant, independent and cheerful from having earned their own money.

Nor does the good work stop here; the fruit grower is paid daily from $450 to $1200 and even as much as $1500 a day. A portion of this goes out to pay for labor in growing and picking and so it will be seen several hundred people are given employment by this one establishment for the entire season which begins about June 1 and continues until November, the last part of the season being the canning of apples exclusively.

If some of our business men will visit the cannery they will find something to set them thinking. They will find where a good many of the dollars come from that come in over their counters. They will find a jolly lot of young folks, many of them school girls "taking their vacation," and they will find the manager, J. J. Fisher, a clever and pleasant gentleman, who though a very busy man will take pleasure in showing them through a very complete plant that some day will be many times larger than it is now.

Complain of Lower Rates.

The Sunset Logging Company, a corporation operating a railroad from Clatskanie Junction to Sunset Station in Columbia county, has petitioned the railroad commission to permit the present rates of that line to stand or if the order of the board goes into effect reducing the rates before the petition is heard the company asks that the old rates be restored.

The company has rates fixed on carload lots of lumber from Sunset station to Clatskanie Junction for standard box cars at $15 with 60,000 pounds capacity and $13 for standard box cars under 60,000 pounds capacity. The new rate which was to have taken effect on the 13th of this month reduced the rate of the standard car of 60,000 lbs. capacity to $12.00 and the one of less than 60,000 lbs capacity to $10.00. By a tabulated statement the company sets their loss at $209 for the month of May owing to the shutting down of the Benson Logging Company.

The board has sent a copy of the petition to Samuel Connell, president of the Keystone Lumber company, the plaintiff in the case, and has given him five days to file an answer to the petition of the Sunset Logging company.

He Fired the Stick.
