A Valuable Tropical Product.
The coconut is marketed chiefly in the form of copra, a name applied to the dried meat of the nut, used in the production of oil, which is in turn employed in the manufacture of soap, candles and a so-called butter.

The fibers are used in the manufacture of matting, some of which are reimported into the countries whence the fibers were obtained, and they are also used in the manufacture of brushes, brooms, rope and twines of several kinds.

Formerly copra was obtained from the coconut by crude and primitive methods, but at present there are plants established for the manufacturing of copra, oil and cocoanut fibers with greater rapidity, less expense and greater perfection.

Machinery is used to break the cocoanuts and to facilitate the preparation of copra, and may be operated by hand, employing only two men therefor. These two men can cut or break 6000 cocoanuts daily. This machine can be bought for 300 marks (mark is equivalent to 23.5 cents) free on board at Hamburg.

A complete plant for the manufacture of cocoanut oil, with a daily capacity of 1000 kilos (a kilo is equivalent to 2.2 pounds) of dry pulp or copra, can be bought for about 24,000 marks, exclusive of the packing thereof.

Supposing the copra to yield 60 per cent of oil in three hundred working days of the year, the plant would have an output of 180,000 kilos, which, at the price of 66 marks per 100 kilos would bring 118,800 marks ($28,274) at Hamburg. In order to produce that quantity of oil in one year, it would be necessary to use 1,200,000 nuts of medium size, which, if exported and sold at an average price of 216 a thousand, would yield $19,200, thus leaving the balance of about $9000 in favor of the industry.

The labor and other expenses should be taken into consideration in connection with this industry, and it should also be borne in mind that for what might be called the natural exploitation of cocoanuts only the large and select fruits are available, while for the purposes of extracting the copra all the cocoanuts are available, and (finally, it should be borne in mind that the yield of oil is greater when the most improved and modern machinery is employed for extracting the pulp from the cocoanut, whereby an output of 66 per cent, instead of 60 per cent, is secured.

Of the three important products obtained from cocoanuts—namely, cocoanut oil, flour and lard—the first product is manufactured at the places where the cocoanuts are cultivated by extracting the white pulp of the nut and depositing the same in pieces in a wooden trough, from which the oil drips and flows by itself when exposed to the sun. As the liquid thus obtained abounds in impurities and is liable to recomposition, the copra or pulp is at present treated by means of improved processes, yielding as much as 60 per cent of refined cocoanut oil, in the factories established at Marseilles, which are the most important in Europe.

From this refinement of the cocoanut has naturally resulted the cocoanut lard industry, which has become so general abroad under the names of vegetable, vegetable lard, tallow and coeoline. These lards are rich in nutritious substances, and neither in flavor nor appearance remind the consumer of their origin. Its patrons have gone so far as to affirm that this vegetable lard is more nutritious than animal lard, inasmuch as it contains 90 per cent of grease, while the animal lard, for instance contains only 80 per cent.

Cocoanut oil is mainly used in the manufacture of soap, three-fourths of the soap stock in the great manufacturing of perfumery consisting of cocoanut oil, which communicates to the paste formed an extraordinary fineness, rendering it also exceedingly foamy.

The flour which is made of cocoanut, and which is a product derived from the dry pulp after being ground or scaped, is exclusively used in confectionary stores. The cocoanut tree yields many other valuable products. For instance, the outer cover of the fruit is used in the manufacture of rope for ships, tow for calking and for many other purposes.

The inner cover, which is hard and smooth, is used as vessels, spoons, coffee cups, and also for veneering furniture, while the outer part of the trunk is considered very valuable, and is used for English cabinet work under the name of "pocupine wood," and in addition to the trunk itself is utilized in the construction of houses, bridges, etc.

Finally the leaves of the tree are used by Indians for making baskets and mattresses, and with the residuous fibers they manufacture excellent brooms. Manufacturing established mostly in England and the United States also use to great advantage the leaves of the cocoanut tree, from
