CORPORATIONS IN CAMPAIGNS.

The New York Commercial, a paper with Democratic proclivities says:

It has been persistently maintained by this newspaper ever since the original bill prohibition federal campaign contributions by corporations

The penalty imposed by the present statute is a fine of one thousand dollars, or imprisonment for one year, or both; and when this section

"To retain the penalty in its present form," he argued, "would be to reduce the prosecution of bribery and corruption at elections to the level

What isn't it on that level now? And how would raising the penalties operate to raise it above the level?

The principle underlying this law, its intent and purpose as well, are highly commendable, above criticism—namely, the prevention of a vicious practice.

So far as is known, there has never as yet been a prosecution under the enactment; but note how it would work, must almost inevitably work,

Let us take a city residence block here in New York, for example; in one house lives the president of a small manufacturing company whose products are highly protected by the tariff law—capitalized at $20,000,

HERE IS $25,010 PUT UP FOR ELECTING A REPUBLICAN PRESIDENT AND CONGRESSMEN—BUT HAVE THE CHANCES OF BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION AT THE ELECTIONS BEEN REDUCED ONE DOTA BY THE OPERATION OF THE FEDERAL LAW?

And if every one of the one hundred officers and stockholders in this manufacturing corporation were to contribute $10 a piece individually,

There are hundreds of ways in which corporations, great and small, can evade this law—and they, no doubt, will evade it by wholesale in the national campaigns of this year.

Raising the penalties will not make the statute any more of a deterrent than now; and until something is devised that will not discriminate against corporations and in favor of firms, associations, clubs, individuals

It is surprising to add that the Cockran amendment was defeated. It may be interesting to add that Representative Fitzgerald, also of New York,

When the house considered the bill prohibiting political contributions by corporations it had not at that time learned of the peculiar relations that existed between the President of the United States and a very distinguished railroad magnate in the preceding election.

Had it had that information, had it known that the President had written to Harriman that he and Harriman were "practical men," and that perhaps it would be inadvisable immediately before a presidential election for Harriman to call at the White House and confer with the President

The congress knows all about that affair now—knows all that is necessary or essential, at any rate, for the employment of it as an object lesson to induce "more stringent provision" against campaign contributions by corporations.

But will it use this knowledge for that purpose? All the chances of it could be passed through the eye of a needle! The sixtieth congress is perfectly content to let the law rest on its "opera bouffe level," especially in a year when the sixty-first house of representatives is to be chosen.
