many dollars to the coffers of old Niblo's theater on lower Broadway. It was not believed, however, in these enlightened days, that anyone would think of taking exception to this harmless entertainment, which, in comparison to the modern musical comedy, bears some resemblance to a religious tract. It remained for Charlotte, North Carolina, to discover that "The Black Crook" was wicked. Last season, when the advance agent arrived in that burg and put up his glaring posters the ministers and one of the daily newspapers arose in their righteous indignation and denounced the entertainment as one unfit to be witnessed by the citizens of that virtuous city. The mayor and chief of police were with the movement but instead of stopping the performance outright they decided to visit the theater in person to see that no immoralities were committed, which they did on complimentary tickets. As a natural result of the agitation, "The Black Crook" played in Charlotte to the largest audience ever in the local theater son, but it went to Boston for a brief engagement and its success there was so pronounced that the time was extended to ten weeks, and it was sent into the larger New England cities immediately thereafter. Its record all through that section was literally phenomenal. Theatre managers demanded its return two, three and even four times, and it is a matter of theatrical history that upon each repeated performance the houses were invariably crowded to overflowing. Thus it was that the delightful "song-play" remained in that territory until June. It is said that this production, in every particular, is as nearly perfect as it is possible to achieve. The "book," written by the well known humorist, George V. Hobart, is described as immensely clever, not only as to the originality of its story but to the many uproariously funny incidents and situations which follow one another closely and which compel moderate and continual laughter. The musical score, which is the work of A. Baldwin Sioane, a light opera composer of note, is said to contain more than the ordinary number of spirited and "catchy" melodies and the costumes and scenery are described as exceedingly beautiful. The presenting company is made up of comedians, singers and dancers, augmented by a vast chorus, and it is said to render a wholly delightful performance.
