Industrial Arbitration in New Zealand.

Compulsory industrial arbitration in New Zealand has been passing through troublous times of late. Awards of the arbitration court have been disregarded. Fines imposed for such disregard have remained unpaid. In one or two notorious cases a strike maintained for months in defiance of the law has been finally settled by employers and employed without reference to the law. It is, therefore, small wonder that further legislation should be thought necessary. Yesterday, accordingly, the minister of labor introduced an industrial conciliation and arbitration act amendment bill in the house this bill appears designed rather to weaken than to strengthen the law, as it repeals the section in an earlier act enabling strikers to be imprisoned if they remained obdurate under milder punishment. The fact is, no doubt, that this penalty of imprisonment for refusing to work except on one's own terms is too severe to be effective. It is a weapon so dangerous in the resentment it causes that little is lost by abandoning it. In other respects the bill is certainly intended to make the lot of illegal strikers—and practically all striking is illegal in New Zealand—harder than it was before. It is designed in particular to remedy a curious flaw discovered by the law officers in the arbitration acts as they stand at present. Clearly during a dispute the possibility of the men's getting financial support from other men or unions is a point of the first importance. During a recent mining strike, as is described in the article from our New Zealand correspondent published yesterday, money poured in to support the men from unions in every part of the Dominion. Since the strike itself was in defiance of an award of the arbitration court, it might reasonably have been thought that those who sent this money were, as persons "aiding or abetting" an illegal strike, themselves doing an illegal act. The attorney-general of New Zealand, however, appears to have advised that a "strike," as contemplated by the act, was an instantaneous deed. Those who merely supported the men after they had struck might do so with impunity. The first object of the present bill is to rule out this reading of the law. A new definition is given to the term

"strike." A penalty is imposed not only for the first act of stopping work, but also for every week that the "strike" continues thereafter. A specially high penalty is to be inflicted for aiding or abetting a strike when this is done by a union, employer or any person other than a worker. Another clause provides for suspending during not more than three years the registration of any union found guilty of aiding, inciting or instigating a strike by any of its members. Whether these new provisions will be found effective remains to be seen. However that may be, their mere enactment is eloquent as to the difficulties of enforcing industrial peace upon those who are determined to have their own terms or war. To have a land without strikes is an admirable ambition, and one that any community may quite reasonably aim at by all means in its power. But the means in such a case are really very limited. The government cannot really under anything like a democratic rule, imprison thousands of individuals for refusing to work under conditions which they dislike. It cannot, except in the case of a strike affecting the public generally, and so rousing public feeling, as a railway strike would have done, depend upon any sympathy in enforcing the law. Rather it is apt to find very effective sympathy on the other side and the way of the rebel against authority made easy. The New Zealand experience undoubtedly suggests that the only form in which state intervention in wage questions could ever be practicable in this country is in fixing minimum wages in really sweated trades and these alone. Those who are above the level of absolute sweating must be left to fight for their own hands.—London Post.
