CONVICT ATTEMPTS TO MURDER HIS WIFE

(United Press Leased Wire.)

San Francisco, Aug. 22.—Mrs. Jennie Smith, wife of convict Harry Smith alias Shellenberger, lies at the Central Emergency hospital today suffering from a fractured skull, internal injuries and loss of blood that may cause her death. She was terribly beaten just before midnight last night by her convict husband who was released from San Quentin prison yesterday afternoon and came straight to this city to wreck his vengeance on his innocent wife.

The woman was in bed when her convict husband attacked her. Neighbors heard her screams and intervened before she was killed. Smith escaped and the police are today searching the city for him.

Smith was captured on the Barbary coast early today and taken to the city prison. He had been drinking heavily and after he was locked up he drank a half ounce of laudanum which he had taken into the prison with him concealed in his shoe. Attendants hurried the man to the receiving hospital where he is writing on his cot, calling loudly on his wife to forgive him.

The rest pleaded guilty but Barnes, who demanded a trial, County Judge Strange, who will pronounce sentence, was attorney general under Barnes, having secured his appointment under the then governor.

The man's hands and feet had been tied with a heavy cord and his head battered, apparently with a heavy club. There was evidence that he had been horribly beaten about the body and evidently died in great pain. The body had been in the water 36 hours. The police think he was murdered, robbed and thrown into the river.

SEES BROTHER; MILES' SISTER DROPS DEAD

(United Press Leased Wire.)

Worcester, Mass., Aug. 22.—Joy occasioned by the visit of her brother, General Nelson A. Miles, was today declared by physicians to have caused the death of Mrs. Mary Jane Merriam. General Miles and his brother, Daniel, went to Leamington to visit their sister. Mrs. Merriam had not seen the general for several years and was overjoyed. She exerted herself too much during the visit. After her brother's departure she collapsed and died within an hour.

The Bryans at Home.

The Bryan family lives today in a handsome house called Fairview on a farm of about 50 acres three and a half miles from the city of Lincoln.

The county assessor assessed this property this year at $84,500, and the rule is that assessments are made at about three-quarters of the real value. In 1896, when Bryan was first nominated for the presidency, he was probably not worth more than a few thousand dollars. The rest he has made by lecturing, writing and by publishing the Commoner.

The house is imposing in appearance, built of pressed brick and stone, with spacious verandas and porches and wide lawns all around. The interior is comfortable, even luxurious, but there is no splendor or garishness and the effect upon entering is one of hospitality. There is a fine barn and stable and the paddocks and stalls are well stocked with blooded cattle, high bred horses and prize poultry.

Mr. Bryan's pair of black carriage horses, have few rivals in the west. They are fast and their action is beautiful. His enemies once charged that the harness of these horses was gold mounted, thereby insinuating that Mr. Bryan was becoming a plutocrat. The charge was baseless, for Mr. Bryan is true to silver in the mountings of his harness if not in his speeches.

The interior of the house is all of oak; the plumbing, electric light and steam heating apparatus are the finest that can be procured. The kitchen is in a separate building, connected by a passage with the dining room. Cement walks and driveways lead to the farm buildings.

The house is entered by way of a great semi-circular porch, leading into a large and beautifully proportioned hall of carved oak. From the porch the view is superb, for the house stands upon the highest point for several miles. To the south and east is a vast stretch of farming land, while in a tree-embowered valley to the north and west the roofs and spires of the city of Lincoln may be seen.

Suburban trolley cars pass the entrance gate, where there is a shelter shed beside the road, and the conductors announce on reaching it, "Bryan station."

Mrs. Bryan is a tall, slender woman, whose friends think her pretty. Her forehead is almost abnormally high and she is as intellectual as this would suggest.

That she might be a help and a companion to her husband she studied law after their marriage, took her degree and was admitted to practice. Her nature is very practical, she is exceedingly cordial to her friends, but a trifle stiff with strangers. She has little magnetism, but a great deal of tact, a good memory for names and faces, and is an exceedingly good listener.—Town and Country.

The Island of Curacao.

While the Dutch are preparing to call Castro to account there comes to us the suggestion that the Netherlands might be willing to cede the island of Curacao to the United States if approached in a proper manner and that, if some quid pro quo for the gift were insisted on, an arrangement could be entered into favorable to Dutch interest in the Far East which would be of mutual benefit.

Although in the popular mind the name of the island is identified with a certain kind of cordial supposed to be fabricated there and with the dismantling of American ships at the beginning of the last century which gave rise to the French spoliation claims, Curacao undoubtedly plays an important role in the future history of the hemisphere. It is an island less than 50 miles off the Paraguayan peninsula and within less than a day's voyage of some of the principal ports of Venezuela—Maracaibo, Porto Cabello and La Guayra. It is less than 600 miles from the Caribbean entrance of the Panama canal. A direct line drawn to it from Portsmouth, New York, and Norfolk traverses Hayti and Santo Domingo. It contains 216 square miles and possesses in the Schottegat, or St. Ann's bay, a harbor having an area of over 25 square miles and a remarkable depth of 150 feet, entrance to which is only obtained through a channel less than 300 feet wide.

The argument is made that Curacao, as a naval base, overlooking the West Indies and the most unstable of the Central and South American republics, within easy distance of the Panama canal, and in the line of all Australian, West African and East South American commerce which must eventually pass through the canal, would form a most valuable possession for the United States. It is equally evident why it is and must always remain a burden to its present possessors. Their interests in Dutch Guiana play little part in its existence. But would certainly European power permit the little Dutch republic to make such a valuable concession to the United States, particularly when attended by a strengthening of the position of the Netherlands in the East Indies through the friendly influence of the great North American republic?

Wrong doing is always exposed sooner or later.
