REMARKABLE BLOOD TIE FEELING BETWEEN AUSTRALIA AND U. S.

By H. Lee Clotworthy, staff correspondent of the United Press with the American battleship fleet.

Albany, West Australia, by mail to San Francisco, Sept. 18.—"We've got a big brother in America, Uncle Sam, Uncle Sam, The same old blood, the same old speech, The same old songs, are good enough for each. We'll all stand together, boys. If the foe wants a flutter or a fuss, And we are hanging out the sign, From the Leeuwin to the Ede— This bit of the world belongs to us." Set to a swinging, martial tune, the above bit of jingle is the chorus of the most popular song in Australia today.

Not only are the catchy air and suggestive sentiments heard in concert hall and cafe, but from every ship of the fleet, the lusty-lunged bluejackets can be heard whistling the sprightly measures or roaring out the concluding line: "This bit of the world belongs to us."

That one concluding line of the bustling jingle epitomizes the sentiment expressed in eloquent phrase and oratorical rhetoric, by the spellbinders of this isolated white continent in their welcome to the fleet at the several ports of Calla as well as the sentiments expressed in reply by their fighting over-sea kindred.

If all the chaff of fervid metaphor and militant simile which have marked the speeches dedicated to the expression of Australia's deep-hearted sentiments toward the seafighters of America, were removed; the sizzling orations which have disturbed the encircling flower-perfumed, wine-charged ozone of the festal board which was spread in Sydney and from which the covers were not removed until the fleet weighed anchor in Albany harbor, there wouldn't be but one surviving phrase, "This bit of the world belongs to us."

So as the fleet is preparing to hoist its anchors and say adieu to Australia, the parting sentiment has found expression in this song, which is from the pen and heart of Australia's rough and ready poet laureate "Dryblower," the non-de-plume a very clever Celt named Murphy.

At the banquet tendered by the Honorable Newton Moore, a premier of West Australia, the night of the fleet's arrival at Albany, the premier, after leading the entire company in singing the song, left his place at the banquet board and sent himself at the piano played the accompaniments for repeated renditions of the song.

A musical verse swings into the "White Pacific" theme in the following typical style:

"Sixteen ships o' war anchored in the bay, Underneath the flag of Uncle Sam Built of Yankee steel, fighting top to keel, Yankee from the rudder to the ram. Jonathan is visiting the lonely Kangaroo, Lonely by the old Pacific sea, But while the ships go by, we hear the warning cry, 'Keep the broad Pacific clean and free.'"

When asked what was the real basic antipathy to the Asiatic, so evident through Australia, Prime Minister Deakin, the popular idol of the commonwealth replied:

"We intend to make Australia citizenship a synonym for all that is civically clean and whole some, and not one inch of our soil shall be occupied by Asiatics or any other colored race. We are creating an empire to be held in trust for the white race."

Epitomized, this utterance resolves itself into "this bit of the world belongs to us."

The coming of the fleet is accepted as America's announcement to the world that our flag is hoisted over our insular possessions to stay.

In this connection the Australian visit has wrought a tremendous change of sentiment in the navy concerning the holding of the Philippines archipelago.

The Philippines heretofore have been looked upon by a majority of naval officers as a dangerous and a useless national appendix. Today there is not an officer of rank with the fleet, who does not express the sentiment that the islands must be held if our national prestige on the Pacific is to be maintained.

In their public utterances they couch the thought in the safe and diplomatic phrase "our common interests in the Pacific" but in private discussion, as one flag officer expressed the prevailing sentiment to your correspondent, the thought takes more specific form.

"If a clash does come with an Asiatic power," said this officer, whose name is a household word in America, "we must carry the fight into Asia from a base in the Philippines."

The fervid singing, "this bit of the world belongs to us," indicated that the thoughts of many officers were ranging toward the north where their flag is waving over millions of incompetent Asiatics.

Now that the Australian visit has become history, the one topic of discussion among the officers of the fleet is "What are the political consequences to be?" The same question was asked by Australians throughout the commonwealth before the fleet's departure.

There has been but one answer. A fundamental principle of our government prohibits entangling foreign alliances.

No officer of the fleet expects, or does any Australian, an actual anti-American alliance to follow through diplomatic channels. But every man of the fleet and every Australian believes that the preamble to an imperishable sentimental treaty has been engraved on the hearts of the two people, which in the years to come will have an important bearing on the world policies of the two powers; especially those affecting the Pacific ocean.

A QUIET PRIMARY ELECTION NO CANDIDATE FOR MAYOR

It is understood that Mayor Rodgers refused to have a petition filed for himself, saying he wanted his friends to write his name on the ballot if they voted for him.

By a strange combination of circumstances no one seems to be running for mayor at the city primaries today.

It is reported that the friends of Lot L. Pearce will also write his name on the ballot.

J. L. Skipton will be voted for as a candidate for marshal.
