RIVER RISES SLOWLY

The Willamette river has not been slow in raising during the past few days, and it now stands at seven feet. This raise was caused by the late rain fall, but as it is generally, the first high water does not remain for any length of time, and today the river has begun to fall again.

The rain fall in this vicinity for the past three days is as follows: Saturday, Nov. 21, .72; Sunday, 22, .30; Monday, the 23rd, .42. Although these rain falls were not exceptionally heavy, they cause the rivers to jump very fast.

The river transportation is very well started now, and the hop shipments are heavy. The passenger patronage is also picking up well between this city and Portland and Corvallis.

The man who sits around the grocery stores and eats the top layers of the raisins will tell you Salem should make no more permanent improvements. He is past improving.

* * *

At the last moment before election, and to keep the people from having a vote on the subject, the City Council has ditched the South Commercial street bridge. The influences that want a thirty foot bridge there prevailed. The people of South Salem have had about $300 of all the taxes paid the past year expended over there, and all they are fit for anyway is to pay their money to improve the old city wards with.
